THE

ADVENTURES.

AND

SURPRIZING DELIVERANCES,

OF

JAMES DUBOURDIEU.

AND HIS

WIFE:

Who were taken by Pyrates, and carried to the Inhabited Part of the Isle of Paradife.

CONTAINING

A Deteription of that Country, its Laws, Religion, and Cultons: Of Their being at last releas'd; and how they care to Paris, where they are still living.

ALSO, TIE

ADVENTURES

o r

ALEXANDER VENDCHURCH,

Whose Ship's Crew Rebelled against him, and set him on Shore on an Island in the South-Sea, where he liv'd live Years, sive Months, and seven Days; and what hist providentially releas'd by a Jamaica Ship.

It eitten by Himself.

LONDON:

Printed by J. Berrenbam for A. Berrefworth and T. Wasner, in Pater notes Row; G. Rivington, in St. Paul's Church sard; J. Bro herron and W. Mendows, in Combill; A. Dadd without tem; he Bar; and W. Chesward in Covens Unriden, 1749.

Price Two Shillings.

C 175 66 27.

Seven Bio part fen stat nece mit perj the

or a neri inst dra tha form

THE

PREFACE.

HE value of history is too universally allow'd to need any proof in this place; but as the subject of history in general is of princes, kingdoms and nations, with their several fates and revolutions; and that the Biographers themselves, who treat only of particular lives, have for the most part cho-Sen to write of men who are eminent by their stations, either in war or peace; it may seem necessary to say something in behalf of transmitting to posterity the transactions of private persons, who have never been distinguish'd from the rest of mankind by their places or dignity, or any thing else but the singularity of their fortune,

THERE is a double use of history in general, that is, one for delight, and the other instruction; the principal instruction, which is drawn from them, relates chiefly to statesmen; that by a view of former events they may form some conjectural judgment of the present:

THE PREFACE.

That of delight reaches every one who takes any pleasure in knowing what has pass'd in the world from its beginning.

THE relation likewise of the adventures of private men is not without its advantage, either of delight or instruction; nay, I may say, that both these are more extensive in the latter than in the former; these reaching to every one, those to but sew. What delight particular accounts give, is plain from the general reception of travels and voyages, and the lives of private persons, which have always been received with considerable satisfaction and applause, when they afford any thing either entertaining, surprizing, or beneficial to the active part of the world.

A MONG these, I believe I may say, that the two following relations merit as valuable a place as any that have been published; but this I wholly leave to the judgment of the reader.

THE

and you take is th

ensoque som TIH Edoum ne

LIVES, ADVENTURES, is a mar I cannot a N'D ni sama I man

Wonderful Deliverances

for my wine, it was found rought me by 14 ?

Mrs. MARTHA RATTENBERG, questions, which they all with ores JAMES DUBOURDIEU.

SIR,

kes the

ures

age,

may the o to light ge-

d the

ways Etion

g ei-

al to

, that

luable ; but

of the

THE

GCORDING to your defire, I take this opportunity of one of my Lord Ambaffador's retinue going for London, to fend you a full account of the strange and wonderful adventures of

n 2002 91

our Country woman Mrs. Martha Rattenberg, and of James Dubourdien her husband; for you must know that marriage in France does not take away the maiden name of the wife, and this is the reason I call her Rattenberg, and not Du old people, but woung beginners in this waibruod

ABOUT

About the fifteenth of February last, I was overtaken with a storm of rain and hail, which forced me into the first publick house I came at, which made a much handsomer appearance than the Taverns of this City usually do; but that was no invitation of my taking into it, for had it been much worse, it had been sufficient to shelter me from the storm.

WHEN I came in, the first person I met with was the mistress of the house, a comely woman of about fifty: Having taken my feat and call'd for my wine, it was foon brought me by her hufband, a man about threescore; for houses of this nature in Paris are not furnish'd with drawers like a London Tavern. I ask'd them both several questions, which they answer'd with great civility, particularly of what Province they were; the man reply'd, that he came from Burdeaux, and the wife, that she was of England; upon which the rest of our conversation ran in the English tongue, which the husband understood very well, tho' he pronounc'd it still like a Frenchman. The good woman finding me an Englishman, said, she hop'd I would endeavour to promote their busipess, by recommending her house to the rest of the English of my acquaintance in Paris; affuring me they should find very good accommodation, both in the liquor, and in the rooms where they were to drink it. We are, said she, tho' old people, but young beginners in this business;

vet

yet we mo

upo

for

on

by

ha

th

in

m

OI

ar

a

ti

1

t

yet with a prospect of engaging my countrymen, we have taken care to make the rooms as commodious as we can, and as like those in London; upon which she desired me to take a view of them, and I found them indeed much hand-somer than I expected; among the rest there was one that might pass even in London it self.

sover-

h forc-

ne at,

e than

had it

fhel-

with oman

call'd

r huf-

f this

wers

veral

civili-

the

d the

h the

igue,

o'he

good

fhe

busi-

ft of

Muroda-

tho es; yet

IT was hung round with several good Prints by Audran Simon du Cange, and other good hands; but that which touch'd me most was a piece of painting over the chimney, not for the exquisiteness of the work, for that was but indifferent, but for the oddness of it, the main matter that fill'd the picture being a sea without one ship upon it, in the middle of it was plac'd an island, much the greatest part of which seem'd to be nothing but rocks; but the low-land, which appear'd to be very small, was adorn'd with several beautiful trees, and fruit, and flowers as beautiful as the painter could make them. My landlady observing my eye fix'd upon this piece, ask'd me the reason of it; I told her that the oddness of the painter's fancy had mov'd me to enquire whether 'twas a representation of any particular place, or only a whim of his own, Ah! Sir, reply'd fhe, that painting I caus'd to be put up here, to put me often in mind of that fignal deliverance which my husband and I had about ten years ago. and which ought never to be forgotten by us.

B 2

OBSERVING

OBSERVING that she utter'd this with some concern, I call'd for more wine, and press'd her to know the story. Alas! Sir, said she, my story is too long for you to hear at one sitting, but I will do what I can to gratify your curiosity; upon which sitting down, she gave me a short account of her life and adventures, from her birth to that time; and tho' she hurry'd it over, yet it took up all that evening, and part of the night.

I have fent you by pieces feveral of the most extraordinary incidents of it, which mov'd your curiofity fo far as to importune me for a perfect narration of the whole. In obedience to your commands I went to the Golden Dragon, and made my request to Mrs. Rattenberg that she would let me write it from her mouth for a friend in England; and gave her this encouragement to do it, that I would come every day and dine with her 'till it was done. The good woman made some difficulty at first of complying with my request, but I had been too good a customer since my difcovery of the house, and brought too many of my acquaintance thither to let her venture the disobliging me by a denial: Having therefore got all things in order, I went thither, and began the work on the seventh of April last, and which I now fend you just as she deliver'd it to me.

Extyriage 10

1

er

ftc

ci

ne

th

tic

mi

I was born, fays she, as I have told you, in Pensance in the County of Cornwal, my Father's name was Stephen Rattenberg; I can't say he was a Gentleman, but he farm'd his own estate, which was about forty pounds a year, a pretty competency in that cheap country, and with which he brought up fix daughters and one fon, all whom he faw married and fettled before he married his fecond wife, my mother, at which time he was fifty five years of age, and my mother not fix and twenty: I have been told she was very handsome, for I never faw her; she dy'd in childbed a few days after I was born, fo that I may be faid truly to have come into the world with forrow; however my father was so fond of me, calling me the child of his age, that I could not be sensible of the loss of my mother.

As foon as I was capable he had me taught to read and write, and gave me all the advantages of education, which that little place and his own small abilities were capable of. The better to encourage my reading, he got me all the pleasant story books which were fitted to my age and capacity. But had I any children of my own, I would never suffer them to read those idle books, since they fill'd my head with so many wandring notions, that I have never been able to settle my mind ever since to my present condition, always feeding my self with vain hopes of bettering my fortune by my change of place, tho' I still found,

Iwas

ne

er

to-

it I

on

int

nat

up

nost

our fect

omade

let

o it,

her

ome uest,

dif-

y of

the

efore l be-

and 'd it at least for the most part, that this change was for the worse.

I was now come to my thirteenth year, forward and pert enough for my age; when my father growing very old and infirm, began to find by his inward decay that he was not long for this world; but all his concern at his leaving of it was, that he left me friendless and unprovided for, tho' he had taken care out of his small income to lay up one hundred broad pieces of gold, all my mother's apparel, and all his houshold goods, except what he had already disposed of to my brother and fifters: He left also a particular charge on his death bed to my brother, to take as much care of me as if I were his own child, and that with fuch bitter imprecations and curses on him if he wrong'd me, as make me still tremble to think how that evil fon of a good father could have so little regard to them.

Now began the scene of my sorrows to open, and no sooner was my father dead, but I found a strange alteration in my condition; for I who 'till now had been mistress of the house, could after my father's burial scarce be admitted to any share in it; for my brother and his family coming now into possession of it, left me but little to do there: I found some small civility at first from both brother and sister, but that was only the better to deceive me, and cheat me of all I had.

Itold

6

po

OI

ce

ne

rei

fur

fm

lin

Iha

rep

gag

real

Per

lette

pass

conv

1

r-

14

is

as,

10'

ay

ny ex-

ro-

uch

hat

im

e to

bluc

pen,

ound

who

any

to do from

e bet-

Itold

I told you that my father had fav'd together a hundred broad pieces of gold for me, these he deliver'd into my custody some time before he dy'd, and therefore mention'd them not in his will, by which he only bequeathed me his household goods, and this was that which gave a colour or pretence to him of cheating me of all my money; pretending, that as heir to my father, whatever money he had left was his: In short, by fair means and foul he got the money into his possession, and then turn'd me out of doors with only my cloaths to my back, and some other neceffaries which he own'd to be mine. I had a near relation liv'd in the same town, whither I retir'd, and was kindly received by him, with affurances that he would fland by me against my cruel brother; but I knew his abilities were too fmall to engage with him, and therefore was willing to get as foon as I could to Plymouth, where I had an unkle, who was a man of fubstance and reputation, and might, if he would heartily engage in my cause, easily bring my brother to

Accordingly I got letters from my cousin in Pensance who had so kindly received me; which letters fully informed my unkle of all that had passed between my brother and me. Out of the wreck of my fortune I had taken care secretly to convey sive broad pieces into my pocket, and which I did not own even to my kind cousin, who who fent his fon to convey me to Plymouth; where without any remarkable adventures by the way, we arriv'd in three days thro' the worst road in the world, and not to be rode with any horses, except such as are bred in that Country, with any tolerable safety to the rider's neck.

My young cousin soon found out my unkle, who at first received me tolerably well; but when he heard that my father was dead, and by the letters found all that had pass'd between me and my brother, I found a visible alteration in his countenance, and he spoke in a more surly tone than before. Well, said he, niece, what would you have me do in this affair? Would you have me go to law with your brother for you? No, no, forfooth, I have fomething else to do with my money, than upon your flory to throw it away on law. I have a great family of my own, and a great deal of business to mind; besides, how do I know that what you tell me is true, I ought to hear your brother first; come to me again when I have heard from him, and I will tell you more of my mind. Come to you again, Sir! faid I, whither would you have me go, or where refide but with you, my unkle, in a strange place, where I know no body? Why did you come then, says he, to a place where you knew no body? I have no room in my house for ftrangers, I don't keep an Inn, nor have I victuals enough for my felf and my family: Pray, mistress, walk and be gone. With that he took

h

n

i

n

n

0

V

f

he ad

es,

ny

de,

en

the

and:

his

one

nıld

ave

No.

vith

wit,

ides,

ie, I

me

will gain,

, or

ange

you

new

Aran-

Auals

mi-

took

me

me by the arm, and made my coufin and I walk out before him. I with my eyes full of tears, and my cousin pale with anger and grief; and had not my unkle been a very old man, I believe he would have beat him luftily: However, we return'd to the inn where we left our horses, and there got some refreshment for our selves. Having cry'd out my cry I began to recover my spirits, and fed pretty heartily; my cousin did all he could to perfuade me to go back with him to Renfance, assuring me of his father's kind reception of me at my return; but I told him, I could not think of being a burthen to him who had so large a family of his own, nor would I give my brother a triumph in the ill success of my journey. After many arguments on both sides, we went both to bed to our rest.

We rose early in the morning, and as sorrow never lay long at my heart, so there was no signs of any grief to be found in my face, but all was jocund and easy, as if nothing had happen'd. That day we spent in viewing the town, particularly the castle and the docks, at the last of which I heard such a character of my unkle, (for he was a master shipwright) that I did not wonder at the usage I had met with from him; for the workmen told me and my cousin, that he was the most noted miser in Plymouth, a miser to that degree, as to make a proverb, As covetous as old Rattenberg; that he had almost most starv'd his family, tho' very rich, forcing two of his fons to go to sea as common sailors, for he would make no provision for them, by putting them out apprentice to any trade, fince that requir'd money, which he did not know how to part with on any account whatfoever; that he yet kept himfelf in pretty good plight, by eating and drinking at other mens cost. Coming home to dinner, we chose to give my landlord so much a-piece to dine with him and his family, where, giving an account of all that had happen'd to me, both at home and at Plymouth, the good gentlewoman of the house feem'd mightily mov'd with my ftory, and ask'd me if I had a mind to go to fervice? I reply'd, very willingly, provided I could get a place easy enough for my age and my ignorance; that I was willing to learn, and to accept her good offices with thanks, if she could help me to any fuch service: She gave me hopes of recommending me to a rich old Gentlewoman, whose business would not be very great; that in the mean time I might stay at her house, and pay her when I was able. Thus another day pass'd on, and my cousin stay'd to the utmost extent of his time and money, either to perfuade me to go back with him, or see me well fix'd in Plymouth; but not being able to do either, the third morning he fet out for home; we did not part without Tears, nor would he leave me, as he thought, entirely without money, and therefore divided his flock betwixt us, which amounted to no more than than a crown a-piece. I manag'd my crown fo well, that with the credit I had in my inn, I made it last 'till I got into service, which was above a fortnight.

ing

ors,

by nce

low

ver;

ght,

oft.

my

and

that

Ply-

ouse

sk'd

y'd,

easy

at I of-

any

nd-

usi-

ean

nen

my

and

ith

not

he

out

ht,

led ore nan

In the mean time, I had been three times with my new mistress, and she had made me read to her, and shew her my writing, both which pleas'd her very well, affuring me, that for the rest I was to do, she would take care to instruct me, and told me, that my business with her would be very easy, since I had nothing to do but to provide and dress her victuals, make her bed, dress and undress her, and wash her linen, and my own, for which I was to have thirty shillings a year; which small wages she promis'd to encrease according to my care in pleafing her.

THE old Gentlewoman had above fourfcore pounds a year, for her life only, and that in small tenements in the town, besides money, which the let out from twenty shillings to twenty pound, at legal interest, and to persons whom she knew to be good pay-mafters: The maid she had just parted with was an old peevish creature, who refus'd to humour her in any thing, but I being now come to her, took care to do every thing to her satisfaction, to study her humour, and when I was acquainted with it, to prevent even her defires in the very minutest things about her; particularly to make much of her little dog and

cat,

cat, of which the was very fond; fo that in less than two months time, I had won the heart of the old Lady entirely. The cold weather now coming on, I was very folicitous that the thould lie warm in her bed, and therefore profer'd my felf to be her bedfellow. By these, and other arts, I had made my felf mistress of her affections, fo far, as she began to use me and love me as her own child, for the was a woman of a great deal of good nature and humanity; and I began to think my felf so happy, that the memory of my past misfortunes wore out, and I thought no more of my brother's cruelty and injuffice, 'till my good mistress told me, she was resolv'd to make my brother do me right. I affur'd her, that I was not in the least pain about it, since the wrong he had done me had produe'd fo happy an event, as I esteem'd the being in her service to be. Upon which, she embrac'd me and kis'd me, and told me she would take care that the being in her service should indeed be a happiness to me; to begin which, the would order her attorney, the most considerable in the town of Plymouth, to commence a fuit against my brother in my name I Interum'd her a thousand thanks, and tho'I had but little reason to regard my brother's good, I yet prevail'd with her to fend to him, and demand the reflicution of my goods and money, of which I had kept an inventory, made by my father before his death, in my pocker, with my five broad preces, which were now laid up in a box my mistress had given me, with

wit

and had vide exp

ture wh mil my had not and not and to able hin too an refe her far nex and

wh

my

day

tell

with such cloaths as she had bestow'd upon me.

less

of

ow uld

my

her

ns, her leal

to

my

my

at I

the

y an

be. me,

eing

me 3

ney,

uth,

my

and

her's

him,

and

nade

eket,

now

me,

My brother had a pretty numerous family, and had not been to good a husband as my father had been before him, to that he was but ill provided for a fuit at law, which must bring daily expences upon him.

My mistress therefore praising my good nature, made her attorney send his chief clerk, who was a Cornish man, and born within three miles of Pensance, to make a legal demand of my due. When he came to my brother, and had inform'd him of his business, he seem'd not at all concern'd, but asking where I was, and how I did, told him, That he had done nothing by me but what was justifiable by law, and did not doubt but that, if I was fo mad as to commence a fuit with him, he should be as able to defend himself, as I should be to attack him. The young man reply'd, Do not depend too much upon your fifter's inability, for the has a mistress, who is a very rich woman, who is resolv'd to let her want for no money to carry on her cause, and at whose expence he was come so far to make this demand; but he gave him till the next day to consider and give a positive answer, and so he left him and went home to his father, who, as I told you, liv'd about three miles from my brother, to whom, when he return'd the next day, he found him very much alter'd in his note, telling him, That he had too much love for me to put me to the charge of a fuit, which I must be fure to pay, if I prevail'd in the cause, and would perhaps find it difficult to find money to pay cost and charges if he should cast me, of which, he faid, he had not the least doubt; but fince he had a love for me, as being his father's daughter, and much belov'd by him, he would give me fifty pounds, in full of all demands, which, as it was all he could any way raife, fo it was entirely out of his own pocket. The young man told him, That tho' he had no authority to make a composition, yet, if he would fend his offer in writing, under his own hand, he would deliver it to me, but could not promise him any success, the case appearing so barbarous on his fide, not only by my account of the matter, but by that of our common relations and neighbours here at Pensance.

In short, he writ so mournful a letter to me, that I prevail'd with my mistress to suffer me to accept of his proposal, which I was the more ready to do, by his appearance at Plymouth two days after the return of the attorney's clerk, when he made the condition of himself and family so deplorable, that I had certainly forgiven the whole, had not my mistress obstinately oppos'd my folly, nor would she let me so much as take his bond for the money; so that he was oblig'd to make a mortgage to my miserly unkle, and pay me the sifty pounds, and take my mistress's receipt, I having chosen her for my guardian on this occasion;

fo h him very noth ney on g day (with forro oun now oun alway furnil Havin ny ol iands nd b ounc antag vould ervice his, t nam

What ime upout the cls and

naster

so he left Plymouth, and I heard no more of him till I saw him three years afterwards in a very poor condition at London.

Now fortune seem'd to smile, and gave me nothing but agreeable prospects. I put my money into my mistress's hands, who plac'd it out on good security for me, and I went on every day encreasing in her favour; and having liv'd with her about a year, she, to my unspeakable forrow, dy'd, but in her will, bequeath'd me fifty bounds more, for my faithful service; so that now I was once again mistress of one hundred ounds, besides my five broad pieces, which I always kept by me untouch'd, and was very well furnish'd with cloaths, both linen and woollen. laving put my self in mourning, I return'd to ny old friend, the inn-keeper's wife, into whose lands I put the money my mistress had left me, nd by her persuasions call'd in my own fifty ounds, in order to put it all out on fuch adantageous terms, that if they had answer'd, vould have kept me without going any more to ervice; but I found it was necessary to manage his, that I should chuse a guardian, for whom nam'd the inn-keeper; so that he was now naster of near one hundred pounds of my money.

WHILST I liv'd with my mistress I had much ime upon my hands, which I spent in reading; out the books that diverted me most, were tracels and voyages; and they had stirr'd up in me a mighty

nd ind

of but

er's

nds,

The au-

ould and,

probar-

nt of tions

me, ne to more

b two when fo de-

folly, nd for nake a

ne the , I ha-

asion;

mighty defire of seeing the world; which defire, fince my mistress's death, grew greater and greater every day, and that which compleated my resolution, was, the arrival of a Gentlewoman at our inn, at least of one that appear'd to me to be a Gentlewoman, tho' she had been a few years before a fervant to that inn; whence going to London, and falling into the fervice of a nich citizen, was marry'd by him, and so made mistress of a plentiful fortune: She was now come down to Plymouth to fee her friends and among others, paid a visit to her mistress the inn-keeper's wife, where the talk'd so much in the praise of London, that I was fully resolve to go thither out of hand; but I had much ado to prevail with my new guardian, 'till I affur'd him I would still leave my money in his hands to be manag'd for my advantage in my absence excepting twenty pounds, which I thought no ceffary for my journey; all the dispute now lay whether I should go by land or by sea, but that was foon determin'd, by information that then was a ship going off of about 200 tuns, in three or four days time: My guardian therefore agreed with the master for my passage, and I went on board the very morning she set fail.

THERE was nothing happen'd in this Voyage worth taking notice of, but the Weather being fair, gave me a mighty love for the sea, for we pass'd our time very pleasantly, being most commonly upon deck; where, among the Passen gers

er.

he

nev

vas

ge

ho

o i

ie i

e v

wi

an

vhe

ay

er

the

our

my

he

with

prof

conf

hat

mis'

Lon

and whe

abou

to y

that

of t

ers there was one who play'd mighty well on he violin, an instrument which before I had never heard in that perfection; the musician vas young and handsome, and had been a voyge with a captain of a man of war up the Streights, and the ship being now laid up, he hose rather to go this way to London, than o ride post with the captain; I know not what he saw in me, or I in him, but he pretended to be very much in love with me, and I was vey well pleas'd to think him so; thus bewixt love and musick, mirth and good comany, our ship brought us to Portsmouth, where she was oblig'd to touch, and make a cefolv'd tay of some days; which opportunity the manch add fer of musick and I took, as well as the rest of affurd the passengers, to see the town, and divert our selves ashore. Mr. Geeting, for so was hands my musician call'd, took care to give me all bfence ght ne he diversion he could, still pressing his love ow lay with all the earnestness imaginable, and his out the professions being so honourable as marriage, I at there confess I heard him with so much satisfaction in three that I could not disguise it to him, but proe agreed mis'd to marry him as soon as we arriv'd at went on London; but this would not answer his ends, and therefore he contriv'd to keep me ashore when the ship should set sail, which he brought about by this means; under pretence of riding to view the country, he carry'd me so far, of the town shut up, which oblig'd us to go

c Passen

lefire,

and

leated

Tewo-

ard to

been

hence ce of a

made

s now riends

iftress

much

to a little publick house not far from it, there to pass the night till the gates should be open'd in the morning.

THERE my false lover left nothing unattempted to gain his ends, but I resolutely oppos'd them, and render'd all his efforts to no purpose; when I was angry he us'd all his art and fubmifsion to appeale me, and when once I was appeas'd, he us'd all his force to anger me again; but I remain'd unconquer'd in spight of opportunity and importunity, from the man whom I found I lov'd but too well, forgiving him all he had done, on his promise of never attempting the like again, and of marrying me that morning before we went on ship-board. Terms of accommodation being thus agreed, we enter'd the gates of Portsmouth as soon as they were open'd, but I was strangely confounded when coming to the place where we left the thip, I found the was fail'd away without me, and my lover had much ado to appeale me by affuring me, that he would fee me fafe to London time enough to meet the ship there on its first arrival; which with finding a letter from the mafter at our Inn, where they generally were when on fhore, made me pretty eafy.

My lover now began to press me farther for favours, which I assured him I would never grant till marriage had made them lawful; but that to please him I would consent to marry that tha ar per you am my enc out flies cryi Bet dy'c ain ho dea nov WO hith mo hap thei bee con ling nigl fery fom hon

with

to d

that very morning; he therefore went and got there pen'd pos'd pose; bmisas apagain; oppornom I im all cempte that ner for never 1; but marry

that

nerally

a ring, and a parson ready, who while he was performing his office, was stopp'd by a pretty young woman, who it seems had follow'd us, among others, into the church, and claim'd This had been my false lover for her husband. enough to have put a man of tolerable modesty out of countenance, but he not at all concern'd flies to her, takes her in his arms, and kisses her, crying out, And art thou alive then, my dear Betty? I had news in the Streights that you dy'd soon after I left England. No, you vilain, reply'd she, I am still alive to plague you, tho' I might have dy'd, nay, been starv'd to death, for what care you took of me, and now I find you endeavouring to ruin another woman, had not fortune brought me strangely hither, to prevent her unhappiness. more words of this nature pass'd betwixt this happy pair of whore and rogue coupled together; for I understood afterwards that she had been a common jilt in London, and was now come to Portsmouth with a company of strolling players, who enter'd that town but the very night before, as if it had been on purpose to preserve me from destruction: I left the church in some confusion, and made what haste I could home to my Inn, there to consider what I had to do in my present condition.

I found my self all alone, in a strange place, without any friends to advise or assist me; I D 2 had had indeed money enough in my pocket to car. ry me to my journey's end, and letters of recommendation from my guardian at Plymouth to his friends in London, to take care of me; I therefore call'd for my landlady, and defir'd her to get me the most speedy passage she could; which she did, by taking me a place in the Portsmouth coach, which set out the next morning. Tho' I was vex'd at my forwardness in listening to the love of a strange man, whom I had never feen before, yet I was not without a fecret satisfaction that I had behav'd my sell with fo much virtue and courage against all his villainous attempts, and was heartily glad that I was got rid of him fo; but it feems I was no so clear of him as I desir'd to be, since before the evening word was brought me, that then was a Gentlewoman wanted to speak with me I order'd her to be admitted, but not know ing any one that could have business with m there, I order'd the maid to fend up her mistre to be with me whilft I receiv'd this visit, but she could not come fo foon as the strange Gentle woman enter'd my room, whom I present knew to be the wife of my gallant, and whole timely coming into the church had done me fuch service: I receiv'd her with all the civiling I could, but she having taken her seat according to my desire, she began to accuse me of keeping company with her husband, and threa ten'd me, with very high words, to give me trouble for it, as well as for the money I had made o car.

of re-

mouth

me;

defir'd

could:

in the next

rdnes

whom

ithou

my fell

d that vas no before

t then

th me

know

ith m mistres but sh

Gentle esentle

whole

ne mo

civility accor-

me of

d threa

ive me

y I had made him spend upon me; by this time my landlady came in, who fitting down, and hearing from me what had pass'd between us, took her up very roundly; Come, Betty, fays she, how dare you venture to put any of your tricks upon a guest of mine, fince you are sensible I know you too well to fuffer an innocent country girl, who has fuffer'd too much by the rogue your husband, to be your bubble too? with much more of this she tam'd Mrs. Betty entirely. However I then interpos'd, Mrs. Betty, faid I, I believe that my club, in his expences with me, will come within ten shillings, and scorning to be treated by such a villain, there is half a piece for you; tho' the mistress of the house would have hinder'd her taking it, but that I press'd it so earnestly: on which she put it in her pocket, and gave us a full account of the rogueries of her husband's past life, by which she shew'd him to be a compleat villain, tho' not two and twenty; but these things having nothing to do with my story, I shall pass over in filence.

THE next morning I set out from Ports-mouth in the slying-coach, which then went through in a day; so that I arriv'd at London late the same evening, which made me take up my lodging that night in the Inn where the coach set up.

ABOUT

ABOUT nine the next morning I took a porter with me to shew me the way to St. Catharine's, where my guardian's friend, to whom I had letters, liv'd, who upon reading my letters, receiv'd me with a great deal of civility, and went with me to find out the ship, which at last we found very near the Custom-House, and the master happening to be on board, deliver'd me my things, and made an apology for his sailing without me: My friend took care to have them all convey'd to his house, where I continu'd for some time.

ra

b

li

ar

lu

Va

al

ar

le

W

ge

by

by

W

co

bu

gr

CO

da

Tho' I had a pretty good stock of cloaths, yet all being made in the country, they were too unfashionable for this town, so that I was oblig'd to have some of them alter'd, and drew a bill upon my guardian for ten pounds more, in order to surnish my self compleatly, but receiv'd a letter of advice, to manage my money with a little more prudence, since my stock was too small for me to pretend to follow all the fashions: However, by a repeated importunity I prevail'd with him to send me five pounds, which was all that ever I had of my money, my guardian, soon after, breaking for a considerable sum.

THERE liv'd an old maid in the house, who being sister to the master of it, manag'd all his domestick affairs: With her I went about to see the town, even from Wapping to Westminster;

or-

na-

re-

ent

we

na-

ny th-

all

me

ths,

was

rew

ore,

reney

was

the

nity

nds,

nev,

con-

who

1 his

it to minster; ster; and indeed she shew'd me every thing that was worth a stranger's curiosity, thro' its whole extent.

BARTHOLOMEW Fair coming on, she carry'd me likewise to see that; tho' the Drolls and other Shews gave me diversion enough, yet the Royal Oak Lottery was what took most with me; for having always a mind to raise my fortune, I was still ready to catch hold of every appearance of doing it; wherefore being instructed by looking on, I was resolv'd to venture what little money I had about me; I took my place and sat down, and did not get up till my good luck had prov'd that my hopes were not in vain. My companion finding that I had won about twenty Guineas, was for hurrying me away, for fear the chance should turn, and leave me worse than it found me.

This good fortune tempted me to go again, which I did several times during the Fair, and generally came off a winner; insomuch, that by the end of the Fair, I had got together by the Royal Oak, near one hundred pounds, which was not every bodies fate with that lottery. This success made me pursue the same course during the time of Southwark Fair; but my landlord and his sister represented the great odds against me so effectually, which she consirm'd with particular instances of numbers daily ruin'd that way, that I sat down content-

ed

ed with what I had got, and only consider'd how I might with fafety improve my gains: The late loss of my money in my guardian's hands, made me afraid to trust it out of my own custody, and yet to keep it by me was not the way to improve it, and the sum it self was too small for me to pretend to live upon, which left me under a necessity of seeking out for some creditable service, which would at least hinder me from impairing it: In order to this, I fet my felf to learn all those qualifications which were capable of recommending me to the most beneficial places that a servant could hope for; I learn'd therefore to raise paste, to distil, and make all manner of confectionary ware, as well as the art of cookery in general, and had gain'd a pretty smattering in the French tongue, by conversing with a French Gentlewoman who lodg'd in the house, who having an acquaintance at the other end of the town, at last got me to be waiting-woman to a Lady of quality, where I had twenty pounds a year, befides a share in my Lady's old cloaths, who being young and gay, made that perquisite pretty considerable to me.

In this post I might have been happy enough if I could have been contented; but to be subject to the will and pleasure of another, I began soon to think intolerable, and therefore all my thoughts and invention were taken up how to make my way into some condition

of

COU cha as g mai thei ing of I con on, pani ion hof maf W ina ble s w rant

Lady dem there whice

HOW

t th

othe

be e

of

of life which was more free and independent.

THERE was one Mr. Rogers who paid his court very constantly to my Lord, he kept his chariot, and a handsome equipage, and made as great a figure as if he himself had been a man of quality; but I understood that his father was a shoe-maker, of Exeter, and not being able to live by his trade, on the first peopling of Barbadges went thither, and had rais'd a very confiderable estate, which was now come to the son, and had made him a Gentleman, and companion for Lords: This reviv'd my old inclinaion for travel, especially to that country, where hose people who went beggars, return'd home mafters of fuch confiderable riches; but being woman indeed was some check to these imainations; yet being young, and not disagreeble, as I thought, I flatter'd my self that I might, s well as other women that went over ferants, come back wife to some wealthy planter: lowever the difficulties seem'd too great for me t that time to struggle with, and I had some other ill fortune to go through, before I could be entirely wean'd from my love to my native country.

WALKING one evening in the park with my Lady's house-keeper, there was a handsome Gendeman would needs talk to us as we walk'd there, and was master enough of that tittle tattle which generally takes with our sex; tho' he talk'd

lition

d

3:

i's

ay

all

ne

di-

ne

ny

ere

be-

; I

and

rell

in'd

by

vho

ain-

laft

y of

be-

be-

retty

h vd

ough

fub-

I be-

efore

taken

[26]

to us both, yet his chief application was to me; we had no way to get rid of him, but by leaving the park, and going home; he feemingly took his leave of us, but order'd chairmen to watch us, as he told me afterwards; and having thus got knowledge of our abode, he foon found out who and what we were; and by picking an acquaintance with one of my Lord's gentlemen, found means of coming into my company, and of making his addresses to me; and made fuch an intimacy with my Lord's gentleman, that he prov'd his perpetual advocate in his absence: I told you that his person was handsome, and his talk agreeable, which, joyn'd with the importunity and the folicitations of his friend in the house, made me at last agree to marry; in order to which, I gave my Lady warning, much to her diffatisfaction, for flie had a particular kindness for me: I assured her Ladyship, that it was not out of any difgust to my place, but that I was engaged to alter my condition, by marrying a Gentleman who had made honour able addresses to me for some time. My Lady examind very nicely into the matter, by which fhe found that I could not give an extraordinary account, either of what or who he was! I told her in general, that I had good affurance that he was a Gentleman of an estate, as well as a man of honour. She fhook her head, and wish'd that Imight not repent of a folly, to which I was hurry'd by my youth, (not being yet eighteen years old) and by my ignorance of the town. had ing ma int ger frie the bot a g tho can mo me mig and con of l wri out wer two after purp ard was told vent be u Pat

this

hono

havin

ha

had too great an opinion of my own understanding, to think I could be impos'd upon in this matter; and so taking leave of my Lady, I went into private lodgings, whence I and my Lord's gentleman, my future husband and another friend, went out of town, and was marry'd in the country, with all the appearance of joy in both faces. I liv'd with him two months with a great deal of pleasure, he infinitely fond, as I thought, and I therefore not a little happy, He came home one evening extremely out of humour, not with me, but with some disappointments he had met with that day: I press'd him mightily to know the cause of his chagrin; and with much ado he seem'd to force himself to comply with my defire; and pulling a letter out of his pocket, (which I knew was not his hand writing) shew'd it me; there appear'd upon the outside something like a Post-mark; the contents were to ask his pardon for not returning the two hundred pounds he had order'd till a-month after: I endeavour'd to pacify him, but to no purpose, for he swore he would turn his steward out of his place for a neglect, by which he was like to be a great sufferer in his honour. told him that if one hundred Guineas would preyent that, I thought it my duty not to let him be uneasy. After some pause; Well, my dear Patty, said he, you infinitely oblige me with this supply; that will be sufficient to save my honour, tho' not answer all my occasions. So having embrac'd me, and taken the money, he went onour-Lady which dinary I told te that

me;

leav-

ingly

n to iving

foon

pick-

gen-

com-

and

entle-

in his fome,

th the

nd in

y; in

much

ricular

, that

e, but

which

wn. had

went away, as if to answer those demands that were on him; but I never saw him nor my money afterwards.

I fat up all the first night, thinking that he might be engag'd at a Tavern amongst his friends; the day came, but no husband; and the people of the house being all of them up, I ventur'd to go to fleep, and lay till eleven o' clock; nor had I been up half an hour, when my Lord's gentleman, who had so great a hand in the making this fatal match, came, as he usually did, to see me and my husband; he was furpriz'd to hear he had not been at home all night, and was afraid that some mischief had befall'n him; which fear had tormented me from twelve o' clock till! went to fleep: I told him that he went out with a charge of money about him. My Lord's gentheman faid, that he would go to all the haunts of his that he knew, to endeavour to find him out. In about two hours he return'd again, but with a melancholy countenance, the fight of which put me into fuch a fright, that I thought I should have swooned away, crying out, What news, Mr. Barton? (for that was the Gentleman's name) What news? Tell me quickly, or I dye away with the frightful imagination? Where is my Husband? Is he well? Alive or dead! Be not frighted, fays Mr. Barton, for Mr. Macknamar is, for ought I know, in good health, but where he is I know not, but where he ought to be I am loth to fpeak: In fhort, Madam, you and has ry was him for do bot fet wil

I fe the thir fie ing

wir Lo is co to ple

two Min

me im any

the

hat

no-

he

rds;

ople

dto

had itle-

king

fee

hear

was

hich

tillI

with

gen-

aunts

him

but of

ought What man's

I dve

ere is

Be Be

cknai, but ought

, you

and I have been both deceived in the man who has marry'd you; for feeking after him at every place where I thought he might be found, I was at last directed to an alchouse in the Minories, where they faid I should be sure to hear of him. Coming thither, the man of the house inform'd me that he was gone the night before down to Gravefend, on board a ship that was bound for France, but he was afraid it would fet sail before he could arrive there; if so, he will certainly come back to this place to night. I feem'd fo much concern'd at the news, that the man ask'd me if he had bit me of any thing? I reply'd, no; but I cannot believe that he would go out of England without acquainting his wife one word of the matter. His wife, cry'd out the woman in the bar, which of his wives? for I believe there are in this town of London, many who pretend to that name, and it is confidently affirm'd, that he is actually marry d to no less than twenty. He never made scruple to marry any woman whom he had a mind to he with, or had any hopes of getting but twenty pounds by the match. These words of Mr. Barton interrupted his narration by my fwooning away: he presently call'd the maid, and did all he could to revive me, and bring me to my felf; which when he did I was too impatient, and too much troubled to hear him any farther at that time; fo that he was going to return to the Minories in order to secure the villain, if he should come back that night, but but at that very instant we heard a woman running up stairs, and crying out that she would fee him, ay that she would, and tear out the whores eyes who kept him from his wife; fo into the room she came, and had certainly fallen upon me had not Mr. Barton interpos'd with more than usual roughness to hinder her; in short, he let her understand that I was really his wife, and that he was present at the marriage; with other words, which brought the Lady to a better temper, who then told us that The was marry'd to him about half a year before, and that having got two hundred pounds of her money, he left her about three months after, under pretence of going out of town upon earnest business; but that having had no letter from him all that time, a friend of hers met him in the street, and dogg'd him to that lodging but the night before; that upon this information she had procur'd a warrant to take him up, which had delay'd her too long to let her find him at home. In fhort, we let the Gentlewoman know the whole matter, and that he was gone on board, in order to leave England; yet there was some hopes remain'd, that he might be driven back again that evening. She readily offer'd her self to go with Mr. Barton to the place where he was expected: When they were gone I order'd the maid to let no body else come up till Mr. Barton's return, and that if any one enquir'd for Mr. Macknamar, she should tell them that he was gone out of town had war

in, ver

no wi and abo tea be OW aln he five the inc for po Là her of fan no to fire lan

uld

the

fo

nly

s'd

er;

ally

narthe

hat

be-

nds

ths

wn

no

ers

hat

in-

im

ner

tle-

he

nd;

he

She

ton

nen

no

ind

ar,

of

wn

town the day before, and take no notice of what had pass'd; and it was well I did so, for there was no less than three women more came that very day, upon the same errand; for his staying so long in that lodging as two months, and the little caution he took in going out and in, had made it known to such who were every day upon the hunt after him.

THOUGH this was a terrible shock, and enough to affect any one in my circumstances with pain and confusion, yet I, with whom grief and uneafiness never dwelt long, after crying about an hour, or thereabouts, dry'd up my tears, and began to consider what was now to be done to avoid those evils with which my own rashness and folly now threaten'd me; almost all my money was now gone at once, he leaving me not above three guineas, about five pounds in filver, and my own old hoard of the five broad pieces I have mention'd: I had, indeed, a pretty large stock both of linen and apparel, a cheft of drawers, and a toilet handfomely fet out, but what was this for my fupport? I thought I might, indeed, return to my Lady, she having not yet provided her self to her fatisfaction; but I was too much asham'd of what had pass'd, to think of entering that family any more, and I found that London was not the place where I was to raise my fortune to that degree which was agreeable to my defires; I resolv'd therefore to leave England, and got for Barbadoes, especially if my Lady would get me letters of recommendation from Mr. Rogers, which I did not at all doubt. Being come to this resolution, my passions were pretty well appeared, having nothing to fear but that I might be with child: Thro' all other evils I thought I saw a very easy way, and of that I was not extremely apprehensive, having had my fortune told me, that I should never have any children; for tho' there may be nothing in the art of foretelling, yet some things having happen'd, as I thought, according to the prediction, I concluded that all the rest would do so of my disorder'd affairs, was to enquire of my landlady, how our accounts stood with her, in order to remove to some cheaper lodging, and found that he had not paid one farthing since we had been in the house; this, with a score we had at a neighbouring tayern, made up three pounds, which was a great deal out of my small stock, however I discharg'd the whole.

go

It was near nine o'clock at night before Mr. Barton came back, and told me that there was no news to be heard of the fugitive villain, against whom he swore the utmost revenge whenever he could find him; but that was but little comfort to me, or any redress of the evils I lay gave taken diffua ing n would my for was took

M by h at m in th fello but t brou whic how had deav Lord and datic been at Bticul in, t age. ty g thin

[33]

ıld

Ar.

ng

tty.

aat

s I

t I

ny

ny

the

ap-

fo

abe

ing

my

er,

dg-

far-

his,

ern,

leal

the

Mr.

was

, a-

nen-

lit-

evils

llay

I lay under; so putting off that discourse, I gave him an account of the resolution I had taken of leaving England: He endeayour'd to dissuade me from so hazardous a voyage, assuring me that he was consident that my Lady would be very glad to receive me again into my former place; but finding all he could say was to no purpose, he undertook to manage my affairs according to my desire, and so he took his leave for that night.

MR. Barton broke the business to my Lady by her housekeeper, who was mightily troubled at my misfortune; for I behav'd my felf fo well in the family, that I had the love of all my fellow servants. My Lady faid she pity'd me, but that I was a rash and obstinate girl, and had brought this mischief on my own head, of which she her self had forewarn'd me; but however, the was fo really concern'd for what had happen'd, that the would make it her endeavour to do her all the service she and my Lord could; and she was as good as her word, and got me such effectual letters of recommendation from Mr. Rogers, that they must have been of very great use to me had I ever arriv'd at Barbadoes. Mr. Rogers likewise gave a particular charge to the master of the vessel I went in, to take particular care of me during my voy-My Lady farther added a present of twenty guineas, and my Lord gave ten, to buy fuch things as would be convenient to carry with me.

[34]

me, which yet I manag'd so ill as not to leave my self money enough, without three of my five broad pieces, to pay my passage; so that when I came on ship-board, I had no more than the two broad pieces, and six shillings in silver, left me; nor indeed had I any occasion for money, having every thing provided that I could want during my voyage.

My Lady would needs fee me before I went, and it was with the utmost confusion that I beheld her, and not with a few tears that I parted from her. When I came on board I found four other young women, a Gentleman and his wife, and an elderly Lady, who were to be my fellow passengers. At Gravesend we took in two young women more, and one man; not touching any where else fill we came to Plymouth, our company was there encreas'd with three young women more, and then we purfu'd our voyage with a prosperous gale, and very fair weather, which continu'd with little variation for a month together; tho' most of the other young women, especially when the sea went a little high, were fick, I was perfectly well all the way; and the mafter told us we were within fourteen days sail of Barbadoes, if the wind continu'd fair. When my fellow voyagers had recover'd their scasoning, and were now become conversable, I diverted my self sometimes by enquiring into their fortune, and the cause of their undertaking so long and hazardous a voyage; love hopes they l

W the n contir or fou morni out, cover' conce eace ange the co arry'c ore th ter be o wif ad fir nuch ave ut no ook d olours out a nade o his

urpos

it for age; two or three of them frankly own'd that love was the cause, others confess'd that the hopes of riches, or at least a better fortune than they lest behind them, gave them courage to venture so far.

ve

ny

nat

ian ver,

10-

uld

ent,

be-

rted

und

his

my

two

uch-

uth,

hree

our

fair

tion

ther

ent a ll all

with-

wind

s had

ome

s by

se of

voy-

WE kept an exact account of the days after the master had told us how long we were to continue still at sea; and now being about three or four days from the end of our voyage, in the morning early, the boy at the top-mast-head, cry'd but, a fail, and about two hours after they difover'd two more, which gave not the least concern or fear, because it being profound eace they were not in any apprehension of langer; when the ships came nearer, we had the comfort likewise to see that two of them arry'd English colours: it was almost night beore they came up with us, and then our mafer began to fear that they were pirates, and o wish that he had made more sail when he ad first discover'd them; for though they sail'd nuch better than we, we might in all probability ave had at least a chance of escaping them; ut now in the dusk of the evening, they first bok down the English, and clapt up Spanish olours, and then sent off a long boat, with aout a dozen men with finall fire arms, who nade directly to our ship. The master proposed o his men to fight, but they said it was to no urpose, they having no guns, nor any thing it for an engagement with an enemy that was visibly visibly so much their superior, both in force and number. You may imagine that we were all in a consternation, expecting nothing but the most cruel and barbarous treatment from so lawless a crew, made up (as the master told us, and as we afterwards found) of people of all nations; however our usage prov'd much better than we expected; for the men in the boat being admitted, kept only possession of her, with out any disorder, till the next morning, when the commander in chief came on board us and finding the women in a great consternation on, he very affably defir'd us to lay afide ou fear; affuring us, that as foon as ever he could with fafety to himself and his men, he would take care to put us on shore. We were glad to find the chief officer an Englishman, and perceive so much humanity in him; they only enquird into the cargo, and the provisions, the latter of which they had some occasion for and leaving us scarcely enough for five or fi days subsistence, they remov'd the rest, with a our wine, into their own ships; and I believe had fo dismist us, had they not wanted our vest for an hospital or store-ship; for having seven of their men fick, they remov'd them on boar us, with about half a dozen prisoners French men, whose ship they had sunk but three day before. Befides this they took away all our fee men and our master, and divided them among their own ships, and put as many of their me on board us, as were sufficient to work out Thip fhip of the Sea, the ber fo the that ther thei VOV with thus figh that whi thre fean drei wer bein wit for thei fo a ctin wif tha fo .

the

fou

force

Were

ut the

m fo ld us,

all na-

better at be-

with.

when

d us

ernati

e ou

could

would

gla

and to

v only

s, th

1 for

or fi

ith a

beliew

veffe

(ever board

rench

e day

ur sea

nong

r men

k ou

Ship

sea, which was the place of their rendezvous; the name of which I have forgot, the I remember that they said something of Cape Horne, so that I suppose this island was not far from that Cape.

Our new master and his men examining into what stores of provisions we had left, found themselves under a necessity of demanding of their comrades as much as they thought their voyage would require, tho' they were contented with but short allowance. All things being thus fettled, the pirates ships were foon out of fight, tho' ours crowded all the fall the could, that they might be able to make their voyage whilst our provisions lasted. We fail'd two or three days in pretty good weather, and our new feamen found leifure enough to make their addresses to the young girls; some of them indeed were very handsome, and fresh colourd, and being wholly at their mercy, were oblig'd to go with them into what part of the flip they pleas d; for my part I examin'd not what past betwixt them, being fufficiently fatisfy'd that I was not so agreeable in their eyes as to be made the victim of their luft; the my felf, the Gentleman's wife, the old Lady, and two others, were all that escap'd them; and how long we had done fo I know not, if their constancy had not held them to their first choice, till the enfining storm found them other employment. AND

And indeed a most terrible tempest, with a violent wind, and frequent hurricanes, turn'd our ship even where they pleas'd, and at last I found quite out of their knowledge. hands we had were fain to be employ'd to keep her above water; this tempest having continu'd for some days, which was made more terrible by the prodigious claps of thunder, such as I never heard in all my life, and fuch flashes of lightning, that made us feem to fail through fire it self: But at last the winds began to abate, and a calmer sea to ensue, to our very great comfort: Yet another evil now came upon us, which we did not much think of during the storm, and that was, the fear of starving, for our proyifions and water grew fo low, that it was impossible we could subsist above three days longer; besides, our ship had suffer'd so much in the past storm that she was very leaky, so that three or four men were continually forc'd to ply the pumps; and the master having made his observations, found, that the' he was in the South Sea, he was yet gone so many leagues beyond his destin'd port, that it was impossible he could go back, both for want of provisions, and the craziness of our ship. But the second day after the storm we were all reviv'd to hear the cry of Land from the top-mast head; our master therefore steer'd directly towards the land, tho' perfectly ignorant of what coast it should be; and a brisk gale rifing up so exactly for us, that our ship sail'd before the wind. The ava league of vaft place on the telefor the where run or confid ther in by a inhabit Noties, volume our metor took of that of appearing our metors.

our p

Ar muste

bisket

lence

as if

r.

I

0

h

h.

e,

1-

h

n,

0-

n-

ra

at

to

ie

ne

e-

le

IS,

id.

ar

ur

d, ld

or

X

next morning we found our selves within a few leagues of a coast that look'd like a perpetual range of vast high mountainous rocks, without any place where there feem'd a possibility of getting on shore; but one of our men who had a telescope, persuaded us, that he discover'd to the westward of those rocks, a flatter shore, so that we immediately steer'd to that part, where we found a little creek, into which we run our ship, with a great deal of joy to all our company, as well pirates as others, never confidering what country we were cast on, whether inhabited or not, and if inhabited, whether by a people civiliz'd, or barbarous; or if not inhabited, what we should do to subsist, since our provisions were now quite spent.

Not considering, I say, any of these difficulties, we all went on shore, by the consent of our new masters; and going a sew spaces up into the country, we were so lucky as to meet with a pretty spring, of whose waters we all took our fill, and found them the most delicious that ever we tasted in our lives, at least they appear'd so to us who had been so long straiten'd in our liquor: We had each of us about half a bisket lest, and after we had quench'd the violence of our thirst, we fell to eating of that, as if it had been the best sood in the world.

AFTER this repalt, our masters began to muster up, and to call over their people, and found

[40]

found that in the storm we had only lost three of the fick pirates, who, I told you, were put on board us; most of the rest were very weak, and more likely to dye than to live; the Frenchmen. and we, were all pretty well, and I was extremely glad to find the old Gentlewoman, who was very good humour'd, and whom I thought the least capable of going through these hardships, the most brisk and jolly of us all. Our master detach'd three or four of his men, arm'd with small guns, up into the country to make discoveries, and the rest went on ship-board, with some of the men prisoners, to bring on thore some conveniences for his sick men to lye on, and to examine into the condition of the Thip, now the tide was out, and not above ten foot water in the creek. About five o' clock in the afternoon our spies return'd, and brought us word that they had been several miles up the country, but could discover neither man nor beaft; but told us that the country it felf was certainly a new paradice, the air all around being perfum'd by the odoriferous flowers and herbs that grew wild there in great abundance; that the trees were loaded with delicious fruit, of various fizes and colours, but whether good for food or not they durst not try; all that they ventur'd to take was some bunches of grapes, which were the largest and most beautiful that ever we faw; and the spies having tasted them before, we all ventur'd to do the like, that is, as foon as our company had brought us a good handfome found fome trem whic They fome were ver'd ward them had a in ca ing t ently perm in the For 1 not f fince whic I cou mori verie men, allow be ve on t then ing, appe

ing t

grew

then

e of

on

and

nen,

me-

Was

the

rips,

after

rm'd

nake

pard,

g on lye

the

: ten

i the word

,but

ld us

bara-

the

wild

were

and

not

d to

were

fore,

foon

and-

Come

we

some stock of them. These refreshed us extremely, afforded a fort of nourishment, of which we had then very considerable need. They ventur'd likewise, at their request, to give fome of them to the fick men; to whom they were fuch a cordial, that we presently discover'd new life in their eyes. It grew now towards night, and upon a private debate among themselves, our masters agreed, that those that had a mind to it, might lye on shore, but within call of the ship. The prisoners were all willing to venture themselves on land, being sufficiently tir'd with the past voyage: However, they permitted us to take all the necessaries we found in the ship; for our accommodation in the night: For my part, I did not much care how I lay, not fearing to catch cold, or any other mischief, fince I expected to dye of hunger in a few days, which was far more terrible than any distemper I could apprehend from this conduct. The next morning the pirate went out again on discoveries, and so did three or four of the Frenchmen, who having been kept so short in their allowance on ship-board, were too sharp set to be very cautious in trying the fruit they found on the trees, and by good luck found many of them, not only very favoury, but very nourishing, appealing their hunger, and latisfying their appetite as well as they could wish, and finishing their banquet with some of the grapes that grew there in great abundance; they loaded themselves as well as they could, and brought them them to us women; some of the fruit look'd like chesnuts, tho' of a much siner slavour, and richer taste; some had the appearance of very large oranges, but upon cutting them they prov'd solid, and yielded a very noble food: Some of the young lasses, and the Gentleman's wife, were afraid to touch them for fear they should be venomous, even after they had seen me eat heartily of them, being willing (they said) to see what effect they had on me and the Frenchmen who had eaten; so they contented themselves with a few of the grapes, which they had before experienc'd to be good and wholsome.

THE night coming on, the remaining pirates were under a great consternation when they found their companions not return'd, and more fo, when the night shut in without any news of them; and indeed it alarm'd us all, and made us think of returning into the ship for safety; but it being dark, it was a difficulty not to be got over by the women, who were therefore forc'd to remain upon the land, and the men prisoners staid with us and watch'd us all the night, for fear of any furprize from the suppos'd natives of that place. When the morning came and fully fatiffy'd usthat we had been afraid of mere imaginary enemies, no creature appearing yet amongst us; we all ventur'd to walk up into the country, men and women: The pirates, not much caring what become of us, employ'd themselves entirely in refitting their ship, stopping all the thicks leaks, leaks, had fu us, ho other also pa to vic and in fore tl count judgn living veral they all ald which lea; they l o ha made found mag whic wo up to disco rest o and as all

this

fcen

back

of t

very ov'd ie of were enortily what who ith a experates ound vhen and k of eing r by rcstaid ar of that fatifnary tus; ounnuch elves the eaks, ok'd

and

leaks, and mending the fails and masts, which had fuffer'd very much in the storm: They oblig'd us, however, to bring back with us grapes, and other fruit, enough for their support. This day also pass'd, and no news of the pirates who went to view the country the day after our arrival; and indeed it was the fixth day, almost night before they came back, when they brought an account, that they had gone, to the best of their judgment, fifty miles an end, and met with no living creature; they faw indeed sometimes several birds, but came within shot of none; that they found the low-lands of the country edg'd all along on one fide with those rocky mountains which we faw by us, and on the other, by the sea; that when they had gone about half way, they beheld a high hill, from whence they hop'd to have a prospect of the whole place, which made them proceed in their journey, tho' they found it much farther in their going, than they magin'd when they faw the hill, to the top of which, they had a pretty easy ascent for above wo miles together; and when they were got up to the very highest part of it, all they could discover, for want of telescopes, was, that the rest of that country seem'd nothing but hills and rocks, and a vast sea beyond them, as well as all round them; by which it was plain, that this was an island, and no continent; so descending from the hill, they made what speed back they could; that the valleys, or low part of the island, was, as they guess'd, no where broader

[44]

broader than seven miles, but every where diversify'd with little woods or groves, springs and small brooks of delicate water, and a great quantity of fruit of various kinds, with which they supported themselves very well in their jour. ney: We were indeed all surprized, that a place To adapted for convenient and happy living should be wholly without inhabitants; and some of us concluded that we were ordain'd to peo ple it; and the young lasses, with whom the pirates had already been familiar, as I told you feem'd to leave no stone unturn'd to contribut their part towards this work; for we had little of their company whenever our mafters were leisure from refitting the ship, to divert them felves, and pass their time in such pleasures were agreeable to them; and we wish'd indea that they would have kept them always with them, for when they were with us they were extremely troublesome, thro' that infolence and impudence which they had contracted by the vices; affuming a fort of authority from their fa miliarity with our present masters, especially one of them, of whom, it feems, the mafter or captain, was so fond, that the others call'd her Governess; her name was Betty Higham, at least the name that she assum'd; she was tole rably handsome, and fung pretty well, and was besides an excellent mimick, had a very good stock of affurance, and by her conversation plainly discover'd her former course of life; and that notwithstanding her pretences of being tho the that lick by of the der hay I fi adv the to tail nec us fur wh pro no to thi for aj co Fr mo an mi The re di.

CQ

[45]

prings

great

which

jour.

place living, I fome

o pee

m the

d you,

ribute

d little

verea

them

ires a

indee

with

ce and

y their

eir fa

ecially

naste

call

gham

s tole

id was

good

plain-

; and

being

the

the unfortunate relict of a broken merchant of that name; it was too evident that she had publickly intrigu'd, and was forc'd, in all probability, by being an old face in London, and quite out of credit, to seek a new fortune abroad where she was less known,

FURNISH'D with these qualities, she had render'd her self mistress of the inclinations, as I have faid, of the principal of our mafters; and I from the beginning determin'd to make my advantage of the interest she had in him, and therefore much against my will, made my court to her, and persuaded her to engage our captain, not only to furnish us with all that was necessary for our lying on shore, but to let us have fuch trunks and boxes as were able to furnish us with materials to keep us at work; which she the more easily yielded to, by my promising that she should have a large share, not only in my cargo of linen, but in my work to make it up. She having fo good fuccess in this, and understanding that in the ship were found several hatchets, and other tools fit for a joyner or earpenter, we flatter'd her and her comrades so effectually, as to get them for our French fellow-prisoners, who were engag'd to me, who was the only person that spoke French among us, to build fome little huts, which might protect us better from the rains than that shelter which the trees afforded us. The French consisted of three joyners, two priests and a sur geon;

[46]

I now have. About three or four miles farther up in the country, they had found out a much more pleasant abode than that in which we now were, and to which we got our Governour's permission to retreat, It was a pretty open space, surrounded with groves or woods; in the midst, there was a pretty large spring, which fed a little brook, that in its course run quite thro' the woods northward.

In this little plain, our builder design'd to fix our new habitations, which they purpos'd to make of a tree they had found out, that was as foft as fir, but of a much finer nature, and which they found would split with abundance of ease. Of this they made a fort of boards, and foon erected four little dwellings; one for the Gentleman and his wife, and another for me and Mrs. Wright (for so was the old Gentlewoman call'd) another for the three young lasses that continu'd with us, and a fourth for themselves; but as for the rest we took no manner of care, fince they chose generally to lie on ship-board with their lovers. These little huts they cover'd with the broad leaves of a certain tree that grew thereabouts; these leaves were as thick as the canvas of which our fails were made, and about half a yard over. They fix'd up our hammocks, and dispos'd our baggage within our little apartment; they found the greatest difficulty to make us doors, having no hinges nor locks £ 11399 locks; above which fide. was fir our cle the ma workn large 1 We h ve cal ags in heir b Madar ery u to fligh had lil f the nade vorld afte of hem asks, cating ung-h nem, lands

o gath

vome

vas no

ook c

m

er

a

ch

er-

0-ds;

ng,

un

fix

to

was

and

nce

rds,

for

for

Gen-

ung

for

nan-

e on

huts

tain

re as

lade,

our

our

diffi-

nor cks i locks; but this they supply'd by making ledges above and below, and fliding the door into them, which was easily fasten'd by a pin on the in-We were all mighty glad when this work was finish'd, as having never till then pull'd off our cloaths, or shifted our selves. Mr. Walker, the marry'd Gentleman, gave each of our French workmen a clean shirt, for he had with him a large stock, which we had now all on shore. We had also prevailed with our Governess, as we call'd her, to get her Lords to change the ags in which they had cloath'd them upon heir being taken, for their own cloaths again. Madam having done us all these favours, we ery ungratefully, and impolitickly too, began flight and affront her and her fifterhood, which had like to have been fatal to us all; for one f the Frenchmen having press'd the grapes, and hade some of the most delicious wine in the vorld of them, presented the pirates with a afte of it, who liking it extremely well, order'd hem to bring on shore half a dozen empty asks, in which we had had fmall beer; and eating out the tops of them, and stopping the ung-holes with cork, commanded us to wash hem, and fill them with the fame juice. ands were immediately set to work, the men o gather them, and bring them to us, and the vomen to squeeze them into the vessels; which vas not so very laborious a task, because they ook care to gather no bunches but what were fully ripe; and we had, besides, the hands of all the madams to help us on this occasion.

[48]

THE vessels being all full, we had immediate orders to remove two or three of them towards the ship, which with much ado was at last effected; and the pirates having been a great while without wine, had no patience to stay fill it was fine, but fell to drinking of it upon the lee. This opportunity Betty Higham took to be reveng'd upon the affronts (for fo The call'd our flighting and avoiding her company) and made her complaints with the utmost inveteracy against all of us; intimating, that she wonder'd that fince we were flaves as well as they, that they did not take the fame privilege with us, but leave us the vanity of our suppos'd virtue, to infult them for their willing obedience to their master's commands. The pirates being warm with the wine, and vitious in their own nature, approv'd the hint, and thought four or five fresh women would compleat their entertainment; they therefore fent immediately two other women to command our attendance, who perform'd their message in a most haughty manner; telling us, that we should no longer pretend an excellence above them, fince the Governess had found this way to humble us; but when we made a difficulty of obeying, they plainly told us, that if we would not go with them, we might expect to be dragg'd thither by some of the men, and perhaps murther'd when they had had their will will fes th with ker, N who to co this o to go felves avoid the n be pr fo we mile, came under one o aft a of the in on difficu tramp to lear our pi ended we go or fou fweari into o

we co

room

went e

of editos at n a e to of it bam r fo any) vetevonthey, with virence eing own r five rtain other o pernner; nd an s had n we

told

might

men,

1 their

will

will of us. This frighted the three young lafses that remain'd with us so far, that they went with them. When they were gone, Mr. Walker, Mr. Wright and I, went directly to our men, who were at work a little farther in the woods, to confult with them what we should do on this occasion; who advis'd us, by all means, to to go up farther into the country, and hide our felves, as well as we could, in the thickets, to avoid their fury at least that night, hoping that the next day, when they were fober, they might be prevail'd on to take more gentle resolutions; to we all together went farther on, about two mile, and bending towards the mountains, we came to a little wood that was so thick with under-wood that we could not get into it; but one of our guards going round it, he found at last a little inlet, through which, by the help of their hatchets, they might be able to get us in one by one; which they did, with some difficulty; and the better to secure us, they trampled about for a quarter of a mile farther, to leave the print of their footsteps, to mislead our pursuers to the next coppiee, where they ended. By that time all this was done, and we got into our place of fafety, we heard three or four of them come running and hallooing, fwearing and curfing; but striving in vain to get into our little wood, they swore bloodily that we could not be there, fince there was not room for even a mouse to get in; so they went on to the coppice I spoke of, where haying ving sufficiently torn their cloaths, and scratched their hands, legs and faces, we heard them return cursing us to hell, swearing they would seek no farther after us that night, having whom enow already to serve 'till next morning.

[50]

We were glad to hear them go back again, but kept our selves close in our lurking place till good part of the next morning was over, but certainly never was so dreadful a night pass'd, not for the thunder and lightning, for we had much greater in the storm at sea; but for the strange noises that seem'd to come out of the ground, which it self appear'd to tremble beneath us.

WHAT I am going to tell you, Sir, may feem incredible to one that has not been us to read the feveral alterations that happen in the earth; the sea sometimes swallowing u whole countries, and fometimes casting up as it were, whole islands in a night, where there was no land before. This, if I may give credit to the accounts I have read, has happen'd in the Archipelago, and several other parts of the world; which, with the finding of fea-shell in the inland countries, has made some believe that the sea and the earth have chang'd places; but be that as it will, I am witness to this which I am going to tell you, and owe to it one of the greatest deliverances that ever l had in my life.

I told

I to

hicket

ates;

hear no t was

IEUR

he m han a

ing u

lace,

were 1

n the

ast ni

quanti Il th

nd r

s ou

full o nto t

the st

were

der at count

entire

in th

heard

ous n

from faw .

yond

by w ratch.

them

would

hore

again,

place

Over:

night

for

5 but

e out

trem

may

1 us'd

en i

g u

g up

vhere

give hap-

other

ng of

fome

angd

ess to re to

ver I

told

I told you just now of our retreat into the hicket, to avoid the rage and lust of the piates; but having staid there the next day 'till hear noon, without hearing any thing of them, t was agreed to fend one of our party out to ain intelligence how things stood, and Mon-IEUR DUBOURDIEU proffer'd himself to be he man; he return'd again in a little more han an hour, full of amazement, and teling us that we might all quit our lurking lace, fince our enemies, in all probability, were no more, but swallow'd up, ship and all, n the earthquake that we felt something of aft night, or were overwhelm'd with that vaft quantity of earth that had risen up and cover'd Il that part of the island where they were, and reach'd even as far, within a few furlongs, s our last settlement. Upon his assurances, full of thanks for our escape, we all came out nto the open country, and went back to fee the strange revolution in our little world; and were stricken with unspeakable terror and wonder at the fight we beheld, finding that all the country, from our settlement to the sea, had entirely chang'd its face; and that in the night, in the midst of those terrible noises which we heard, the sea or earth had thrown up prodigious mountains for twelve miles together; that is, from the most Westerly point of those rocks. We faw at our coming hither, even fix miles beyond the main land of the island to the West, by which jetting out into the sea there was form'd

form'd a fort of a haven, or calm road, protected against all winds but the West and Northwest; that from the heighth of these mountains, in all probability, there had tumbled down such vast quantities of earth, as to have cover'd all the low-land, and part of the sea, for betwixt three and sour miles broad, and so rais'd the surface by an easy ascent up to the mountains themselves.

WE view'd all this fo long, that we were almost stupid with the confusion which it gave us; bleffing our good fortune that had made us fly fo far from this dangerous neighbour hood; and tho' the pirates and their Ladies were a parcel of most profligate wretches, we could not but pity their terrible fate, which had fo on a fudden funk them in the midf of their fins; but our own proper fears foon banish'd these considerations, and made us think of removing to some other settlement, farther from this direful place; but fince we could not presently carry away our effects, we were content to go only with our hammocks fome few miles from it, 'till we had fix'd upon a convenient situation: And upon a full debate of the matter, we came to this resolution, that we would fettle as near as we could to the middle of the island; so our Gentlemen, in a few days, found out a pleasant hillock or rifing ground, fomething more than two miles from the Western sea, and above three thre the mid fide ham WOO lode with labo the fran joyn they brou thin foly' befo they wan indu and toler > keep tatio ing mak ly n abod

oro-

and

um-

s to

oad,

t up

re al-

gave nade bour

adies

, we

which

midf

foon

le us

ment,

s, we nocks d up-

a full

could

entle-

nt hil-

than above three three from that range of rocks which ran cross the country to the East; and much about the mid-way, between the North and the South fide of the island. Near this we fix'd our hammocks, under the shelter of the adjacent woods, 'till we could be provided with better lodgings; which our Gentlemen went about with the utmost expedition, every one of them labouring hard to contribute to the finishing of the work. But the first thing they did was to frame four forts of carriages, to which the joyners made broad low wheels; as well as they could; and with these, in a little time, brought away our baggage, and what other things were necessary for our work. They refoly'd now not to make four different huts, as before, but one contiguous building; and tho they labour'd with a great many difficulties for want of iron-work, yet, with a great deal of industry and pains, they supply'd that defect, and in about three month's time compleated a tolerable habitation, and we fettled in our new abode with a great deal of fatisfaction.

Our house being thus finish'd, our men, to keep themselves employ'd, and make our habitation the more convenient, went upon furnishing it with tables, and such seats as they could make, 'till we had all things that were absolutely necessary for our accommodation.

[54]

MR. Walker, his Lady, and the old Gentlewoman could speak no French, nor could the Frenchmen at first speak any English, but in time they came to speak it intelligibly; 'till when, most of the conversation run thro' my hands, I being interpreter to them all, tho' they were every one full of the complaifance, so usual in those of that nation; yet Monsieur Dubourdieu discover'd a more than ordinary civility to, and care of me, nor did he at last make any scruple of declaring, that he had a peculiar love for me.

ONE day when the men were gone out for provisions, or a walk, and we women were left alone, Mrs. Walker discover'd a very great uneafiness at her present condition, and express'd her fear that she should never get from this place. I did what I could to comfort her, and told her, that I thought our present state something better than that of our first parents after the Fall, they being more folitary for feveral years together, fince there was no other people in the world but themselves, nor could expect any 'till their children were grown up fit for conversation; but we were a pretty jolly company, and were not without hopes we might be deliver'd by the chance arrival of some ship. True, faid she, but that is very uncertain, since I find, that the pirates themselves, who are us'd to these feas, knew nothing of this island; so that there is I cre lon the fine ing inte nur Di for but faid fix husl thei prie can Du muc thou alrea

T whic that, came them earne over They

would

man

e

e

ı,

re

in

eu

nd

u-

for

for

ere reat

s'd

acc.

her,

bet-

Fall, oge-

the

any

con-

any,

e de-

True,

find,

these

there

is more probability of the decrease than the increase of our company. Oh, Madam, said I, as long as you live, I hope we shall every now and then increase by a little one from you, since I find, at last, an instance of it from your being with child. That will be but flow work, interpos'd Mrs. Wright, unless you add to the number of our breeders, by marrying Monsieur Dubourdieu, who has long express'd his love for you. I would fain have diverted the discourse, but the old Gentlewoman went on; you find, faid she, that he is the only person among the fix men whom you can make choice of for a husband; the three joyners you hear, are, by their own confession, marry'd men; and the two priefts, you know, according to their Religion, can have no wives: Nor, said I, is Monsieur Dubourdien like to have one in me, he is too much a stranger for me to entertain any such thoughts about him, and I have fuffer'd too much already, by being credulous of the professions of mankind.

This was the sum of that day's discourse, which Mrs. Walker told her husband, and in that, the rest of the company; as soon as they came to us, Monsieur Dubourdieu return'd them thanks for their good offices, and desir'd earnestly that they would renew them, nor give over 'till they had vanquish'd my obstinacy: They perfectly comply'd with his desire, nor would let me alone; 'till having had sufficient ly believing that I should have better fortune with him, than I formerly had, either with the English or Irishman; in the beginning of the third year, I consented to become his wife, and the ceremony was perform'd by the elder of the two priests, who could speak the best English, and who was forc'd to satisfy me, in performing it over again, according to my Common-Prayer Book.

This year was remarkable, not only for my marriage, but for the birth of Mr. Walker's child, tho' the last was as melancholy an incident, as the first was merry; for tho' we brought the child alive into the world, it liv'd not many days; and the mother, to the unspeakable sorrow of the husband, dy'd before the end of the month; we buried her with all the solemnity that we were able, but could never appease Mr. Walker's grief as long as he liv'd, which was not many months after his wife: His death happen'd in the following manner.

The men having work'd themselves entirely out of employ, knew not what to do with themselves, but rambled up and down every day, from one part of the island to another. The pirates about two days before their miserable catastrophe, had been rowing about in the long boat by the North side of the island, in hopes to discover some other part of it; but having row'd row'd came point, run ab where er, de after, he No oose, went a lace 1 cars a o out ates h nd th ome t ion'd, he fou hem: he pri enough ially away, of their turn'd minish

WE years m

reduc'd

had no

Gentle

rine

th

of

fe,

ler

eft

in

m-

my

ild,

the

live

and

the

ath;

we

ker's

ma-

en'd

irely

iem-

day,

The

rable

long

opes

ow'd

row'd about twenty miles to no purpose, they came back again, and doubling the Westward point, they put on shore in a little creek that run about a quarter of a mile within the land, where they fasten'd her in about two foot waer, defigning the next day, or a day or two fter, to renew their enquiry, and go farther on he Northward coast, but were prevented, I supofe, by some other thoughts, and so never vent again. This boat was found in the same lace by some of our company, almost three cars after, and it was agreed among them to o out the fame way from her, which the piates had gone, to try to make some discovery, nd the rather, because when they had been ome time upon the North hill, formerly menion'd, they either heard, or thought they heard, he found of trumpets, or some instruments like hem: Accordingly the three joyners, one of he priests, and Mr. Walker, putting provisions nough on board to serve them two days, espeially a large quantity of grapes, they row'd away, but how far they went, or what became of them, we could never learn, for they return'd no more to us: This was a great diminishing to our little company, which was now reduc'd to four persons; viz. the priest who had no mind to go upon this expedition, the old. Gentlewoman, my husband, and my felf.

WE had nothing remarkable for above two years more, the same things happening to us eve-

Ĭ

[58]

my day over and over again, with very little val riation, which afforded nothing worth relating; we cat of the fruit, and drank of the purling stream, sometimes moderately improv'd with the juice of the grape, which we got and preserve in little vessels, with which nature furnished us: for there grew a fort of fruit upon a stalk which lay upon the ground, much like our pompions in England, tho' near as large again as any that I ever faw; the outer rind was pretty hard, fo that they were forc'd at first to use hatchets to cleave them open, in order to fee what they contain'd; besides this outer rind, which was some thing like the shell of a nut, tho' ten times thick er than any that I know of, there were two other rinds, about two inches thick each, and near as foft as that of a melon; under all the there was a very pleasant food, of which one of the joyners ventur'd to taste, invited by the fine ness of its smell, and we all follow'd, he has ving made the experiment; and it is observable that we never met with any thing noxious a mong all the fruits and herbs, which were in plenty in this place, most of which, some of us tasted at one time or other; the upper rind of this fruit was as easily clear'd of all it contain'd, when open'd, as a nut-shell is of the kernel; our workmen therefore, instead of splitting them, as at first, saw'd off the head, and so made compleat vessels that held about three or four gallons, and these we fill'd with the juice of the grape, of which we made two forts, one, by laying a great great ther c grapes benea no me them afund a grea preser ty cave our w part o of a h ake it wine even y ftro went fter in itude. pany v fy'd, 1 till I loft,

The out a to fee times but it

t was

afflicti

le va

ating;

arling

th the

ferv'd

d us;

which

pions

y that

rd, fo

nets to

y con-

fome.

thick

e two

, and

thele

one of

e fine

he ha

vable

Ous a

ere in

e of us

of this tain'd,

ernel;

them,

com-

allons,

grape,

ing a great

great heap of bunches full ripe upon one another on a clean table, and the weight of the grapes press'd one another, whilst our vessels beneath caught the juice as it fell; and when no more came away by this means, we squeez'd them with our hands, but kept these two juices asunder in different vessels, for there was indeed a great deal of difference in the wine; but to preserve our liquor the better, they digg'd a pretty cave in the fide of a bank, and there we plac'd our wine, having first cover'd it with the upper part of the shell, around which was fix'd a fort of a hoop, and in the middle of it a handle to ake it off and put it on: There was some of this wine left, which we made in the fecond year, even when I left the island, for it was of a vey strong body, and would have kept, I believe, wenty years, fixteen I am fure it did, for fo long fter it was, before I was deliver'd from this foitude. I have already told you how our company was reduc'd; but fortune was not yet fatisfy'd, nor was I come to the heighth of my tryal, till I was left quite alone: The next two that loft, was the priest and my husband, tho' t was above two years after before I had that affliction.

THE priest, and Mr. Dubourdieu, went daily out a walking, either to the sea side Westward, to see if they could discover any ship, or sometimes to the North-west hill on the same errand, but it was long before they ventur'd upon the new hill hill that was risen upon the South-west part; but at last seeing it all over green, they went up to the top of it, and from its height look'd out for ships, but to no purpose; this being too far for a day's walk, without a great fatigue, they would not venture to flay long for fear of frightening us by their absence, without letting us know of it beforehand; but they agreed to go on purpose to stay a day or two, in order to fearch it from one end to the other; accordingly, in about a week's time, they went, and return'd in three days after, giving us this ac count; That the hill thrown up in the night was about twelve miles long, and three mile in the declivity; that going to the most easter ly part of it, they came within ten foot of the mountainous rocks that were there before that being there by day break, they heard the most harmonious musick, both vocal and instru mental, that could be imagin'd on this fide her ven: The prieft, who had been in Italy, and present at all the performances of both voices and musick, which were eminent in that coun try, declar'd, that they were all infipid and flat in comparison of what he had now heard; and they both told us, it seem'd to them to pass on like a procession, tho' it was of some hour continuance.

This had rais'd our curiofity fo far, that we refolv'd to take a journey with them, to participate of the same pleasure: Accordingly, we walk'd the day boa of we fo, with doy the hon

ing performance it, famoust.

appo four had art;

vent

ok'd

to0

igue,

ar of

tting

cd to order

CCOr.

, and

is ac night

mila

easter-

of the

cfore

rd the

le hea

, and

voices

coun

nd flat

1; and

o pass hours

hat we to par-

ly, we walk'd

walk'd the first day to our former habitation, and resting there all night, began our walk to the top of the hill by the very first appearance of daylight; but nothing could we hear of their boasted harmony, except some distant sounds of wind instruments, which was so faint that we could not determine whether it was really so, or only the effect of sancy; so that tir'd with our waiting to no purpose, we came down again, and spent the rest of the day in the shade, and the night in our old huts, and the morning following we set forward for home.

The priest and my husband, notwithstanding our bantering them, and endeavours to persuade them that all they had told us was nothing but a pleasant dream, they persisted in the fact; and, upon many deliberations, concluded that it must be the inhabitants in the mountainous parts, who were that morning, when they heard the musick, performing some solumn festival perhaps to the Moon, since it was much about the new Moon when they heard it, and therefore they resolved to be at the same place the next change of the same planet.

THEY went accordingly, but were again difappointed, hearing nothing but those distant sounds which we had imagin'd that we also had heard: All which had heighten'd their curiosity riofity fo far, that they resolv'd to endeavour to make a discovery of what was conceal'd in those mountains. All the difficulty was how to get upon them, for betwixt the new mountains and the old ones, there was a fort of a gap or chasm, which they judg'd to be about ten or twelve foot over, and above fifteen deep; they concluded therefore to lay a fort of a bridge a-cross it: And in order to it cut down one of the light trees, whose body was above fifteen foot high, but so small, that when they had cut it out it was not much above half a foot broad; however, with a pole of the same length, and each his hatchet stuck in his girdle, they went upon this new expedition, much against my inclinations, and contrary to my defires. The day after they were gone I had a mind to follow them, but my old Gentlewoman was taken so ill, that she could think by no means of fo long a jaunt, nor could I think of leaving her alone when she was not well; so I determin'd to wait with patience the return of our men. Mrs. Wright grew worse and worse every day, and I more impatient to know what was become of my husband: In short, in a little more than a week's time, worn out with age and her evil fortune, she gave up the ghost. But before she dy'd, observing my grief, she took me by the hand, and begg'd me not to give too much way to forrow, but preserve my felf for better fortune; which, in time, she was confident would be my lot, at least if I thought thorfolia but to d bein fo c con fhe hole how the hup.

I men days fami long go to and 1 my f fome as to every and t the li goble my fe fet fo the h

Ċ

IS

r

r

y

ze

ne

ifey

a

ne

le,

3-

es.

vas

ans

av-

o I

of

orse

hat

na

vith

oft.

she

not

crve

fhe

if I

ught

thought it better fortune to be restor'd from this solitude to a more habitable part of the world; but as for her part, she was very well content to die in these unknown regions of the earth, being as near to heaven there as any where else; so charging me not to throw away hope, and commending her self earnestly to her Maker, she expir'd.

It was with some difficulty that I digg'd a hole capable of receiving her body; which, however, I at last effected just without our little house, and putting her into it, cover'd her up.

I was thus left all alone to bemoan and lament my unhappy state, which I did for some days; but this irksome solitude growing more familiar to me, and grief, which feldom lay long in my bosom, wearing off, I resolv'd to go towards those parts whither my husband and the priest were already gone, and where my fondness gave me hopes that I might find fome footsteps of them. I had no great care as to taking provision with me, fince the trees every where afforded me food as I went along; and the springs, which were very frequent, all the liquor I desir'd; putting therefore a little goblet in my pocket, with a knife, I loaded my felf with the lightest hammock I had, and let forward by break of day; and refting all the heat under the shade of the trees, I went on again till the evening; when fixing my hammock on two trees, I rested very heartily all night, being fufficiently tir'd with my walk, tho' not above ten miles. The next morning I proceeded on my journey, and that day reach'd ten miles more, as well as I could guess, that is, within two miles of the foot of the mountain; there again I fix'd up my hammock, and rested as before. As soon as day appear'd I got up, gather'd some fruit to eat, and some grapes to supply the place of drink; and putting them in my handkerchief I went on, and got at last up the mountain, which was an easy ascent for about three miles together; where refreshing my self with eating the viands I had brought with me, and resting a while I turn'd towards the East, and went forward 'till I came to its extremity; but all that I could find by this great fatigue was a pole and plank laid across that gap in the mountain which I formerly mention'd; on the left hand of which there was nothing dreadful, fince it was not above fifteen foot deep; but to the right a most fearful precipice, which was the only thing that hinder'd me from purfuing them over the plank, the very fight of the precipice making my head giddy; I was therefore forc'd to fit down and bewail my misfortunes, the very best I having to hope, being that they were got fafely over; tho' doubtless, by their long stay, they must be fallen into the hands of the inhabitants of that country, if any, with with v my or down coul morni refolvi when heaver brieft 1 ing f went : hearin but b was f ward, ny fati gan to hence bitants tertair could them, cruel; my o comin which as the night;

I wen

cafy jo

divide

ther e

m-

all

lk,

ng

lay

ıld

of

m-

day

eat,

nk;

ent

ich

to-

ring

rest-

and

ity;

igue

the

the

ead-

ep;

hich

pur-

the

nere-

sfor-

eing

tless,

the

any,

with

with whom, what fate they had met, was now my only fear; so after some hours I return'd lown the hill, and came to my last lodging. could not be fatisfy'd without returning next morning by day-break, to the very fame place, resolving to try to pass the plank my self, but when I came there I was furpriz'd by that heavenly musick which my husband and the priest had so often talk'd of, and which, still pasing forward, continu'd till near noon, and vent from me by degrees, till quite out of my hearing; then I look'd again at the passage, out being quite dizzy with the prospect, I was fain to throw my self immediately backward, or I had fallen down I know not how mahy fathom deep. Being come to my self I bean to confider of what I had heard, and drew hence this comfort; that if there were inhabitants in that part of the island, they were tertainly of a very humane kind, fince they could not have that charming musick among them, and yet retain any thing barbarous and cruel; wherefore I determin'd to return to my own home, and wait with patience the coming back of my husband and his friend, which I persuaded my self would be as soon as they could find any means of escaping; so I went back again, and rested my self that night; the next morning I set forward, and by easy journies reach'd again to my house; where I divided my time betwixt prayers and such other employment, as was necessary for my subfistence.

fiftence. I spent much time in reading those sew books which I had by me, especially the Holy Bible, in which I found great comfort; sometimes I took pen, ink, and paper, of which I had a stock by me, brought out of England for my own use in Barbadoes. The subject of my writing was to give an account of all that I could remember had happen'd to me during my whole life, to that very time; which I did partly for an amusement, and partly that if any one else should come upon that coal after I was dead, they might find my story.

It was above three years before I faw my husband again, and the greatest uneasiness I had during all that time, was, that I should lose the use of my tongue by so long a silence; but to prevent that evil, (for such a woman thinks it) I frequently talk'd to my self; I often sung both French and English songs: And when I took any books in my hand, I always read a loud, and pronounc'd my words as distinctly as if I had other auditors to hear me.

DURING these three years of solitude I had nothing happen'd to me that deserves a particular narration. When the three years were over, and some odd months, sitting at my door towards the evening, under the shelter of such trees as had been planted about it, I was not a little surpriz'd and frighten'd, to see two naked men make towards me; I immediately ran in a-doors, and sastned my self as well as I could, could, by my at last to the nen g gave 1 and y them. meeti I had feein were his b the t that was cam con in me ma adv for had in

of

liev'

those

the Ho.

fome.

which

ngland

pject of all that

e du

which

ly that

coaft

w my

I had lose

but hinks

fung ien I

ad a

ly as had arti-

vere

loor

uch

not

na-

ran' is I ild,

y.

could, and was, with some difficulty persuaded by my husband and his friend (whose voices at last I knew) to open the door and come out to them; however I immediately got such linen garments as I had formerly made, and gave them my husband out of the window, and when they were cloathed came out to them. I need not tell you the joy of our meeting, after so long an absence, and when I had given over almost all thoughts of ever seeing him again. After our first embraces were over, I gave him my scissers to cut off his beard; for he had no other instrument all the time fince our shipwreck, or landing on that coast, to perform that office; the priest was resolv'd to let his beard grow 'till he came into France, which he faid he verily believ'd he should do before he dy'd.

This night of our meeting, seem'd the most comfortable that ever I knew in my Life, folding in my arms the husband I lov'd, and who lov'd me entirely. After I thought him lost, you may be sure I was inquisitive enough into their adventures since they left me; particularly what sort of inhabitants they had found, and what had detain'd them so long from me. They told me that they had certainly been in Paradice, that the inhabitants were perfect Angels, and yet nothing kept them so long away but their being under a sort of consinement till the hour of their return. The particulars of all this I k 2 shall refer to my husband's account, who was better able to describe what he had seen with his own eyes, and heard with his own ears, than I, what I only had by relation.

HERE my landlady made an end, and having inform'd her husband how far she had gone in their story, desir'd him to give a sull account of all that pass'd afterwards, 'till their arrival and settlement in Paris; but this was reserv'd 'till the next day, when after dinner my landlord Dubourdieu thus began.

I have nothing to acquaint you with, Sir, relating to my felf or family, or any of my affairs in France; they contain nothing remarkable enough to deferve your notice; let it suffice, that my father being a citizen of Bourdeaux, had me bred a Surgeon, hoping to prefer me to his Majesty's service sooner that way than any other; however, meeting but with little Practice, I resolv'd to take the opportunity of a ship bound for Martinica, hoping in that new fettlement to make my fortune: It being a time of peace, tho' out thip was a pretty good burthen, and carry'd fifteen guns, yet expecting no enemy, The was but ill provided with ammunition and men fit for an engagement, yet she made a pretty good defence against the three pirate ships which attack'd her, and had it not been for an unlucky shot which took her betwixt wind and water, I believe we had made made of the us, we aboar Englisheir of my an action of we were the contraction of the contractio

W the j ther down and v ded t ving g we a we h beaut ever t thro trees, on sti furpri three to be no m coats. cd us mile

ras

ırs,

ng

int

nd.

till

ord

Sir,

my rc-

let

our-

pre-

way

vith

uni-

ing

ne: was

uns, ded

ent,

the

had

bok

nad

adc

made our escape, but now sinking in the midst of the fight, all her men perish'd, except six of us, who were taken up by the pirates, and put aboard one of their ships. The day before, the English ship, in which my wife was, fell into their hands; all that past afterwards, to the time of my return to my wife, she has given you an account of; I shall therefore begin my narration at our passing the gap in the mountains, of which she has told you.

WHEN the priest and I were got over the plank, and fix'd our footing on the other side, we had some difficulty to get down a steep place of about five or fix yards, and which, like a wall or rampart, furrounded the inhabited part of the island; but having got down on the firm land, as I may call it, we advanc'd to the brow of the hill, whence we had a full furvey or prospect of the most beautiful and charming country that our eyes ever beheld; hence we began our progress down thro' pleafant groves, or frequent groupes of trees, for above a mile together; proceeding on still, near the end of another mile, we were furpriz'd, and frighten'd too, to see at our backs three huge animals, that at first appear'd to us to be Lyons, but coming up with us, they did no more than take hold of the lapet of our coats, or linen garments we had on, and thus ed us down to the foot of the hill, above half a pile farther; they at last brought us into a plain, where where there were thousands of people, some in an adjacent pool or pond, and others on its banks, men, women and children, and all stark naked; the men were all tall, and feem'd to us of a larger fize than generally our Europeans are, but of a perfect symmetry, and their eyes seem'd so carry a perfect awe and majesty in them; their hair was generally of a light brown, curling in ringlets a little below their shoulders; that of the women something more yellow, and falling down even to their wastes; not without frequent curies, which made it the more grateful. The women were all crown'd with chaplets of beautiful flowers, and the men had no weapon in their hands but a fort of a white staff, about seven foot in length, at the end of which was fixt a fort of cutting hook, with which I found afterwards they shear'd and trimm'd the trees. As soon as our Lyons had brought us into their presence, they let go their hold, and about a dozen men fur rounded us without coming very near us. The whole company seem'd as much surprized at our company, as we were at theirs: And one of them spoke to us looking with a stern countenance but we understood not what they said; but we was inform'd afterwards they demanded of who, and what we were? Whence we came And how we got thither? Their country being furrounded by vast and unpassable seas, as the then thought them. All that we could do w to make thew of an humble submission, and fign onord w

[79]

A:

to

wi

the

bee

cou

the

fton

mer

con

fpac

or d

a for

and

as w

let u

guide

entrai fount

other us to

we so native

though

in

rk.

us

re,

n'd

m;

vn,

oul-

ore

stes;

tithe

wn'd

ut 4

ngth,

they

as our

they

en fur The

at our

of them

enance

but We

d of w

camel

as they

on, and

fign

figns of our begging their mercy and protection; so they feparating again pointed to the Lyons, and utter'd some words, upon which two of them came and seiz'd us by the garments, as before, without doing us any farther injury. One of the company went on before, and beckon'd us to follow him, which we did, being still held by our guardian Lyons: As we pass'd on, the whole company open'd to the right and left, to let us go thro' them, without touching of them; which, it feems, they thought an abomination before we had been purify'd, according to the custom of that country, or rather according to the precepts of their laws, fince that can fcarce be call'd a cufrom which had not been done before in the memory of any one then living. Our guide conducted us fome miles to a little plain, or open fpace, furrounded by a fort of quick-fet hedge, or dwarfish trees; in the midst of it there was a fort of a fountain, or little pond, very clear, and about half the depth of a man: As foon as we were enter'd this little plain, our Lyon's let us go, in obedience to a nod from our guide, and plac'd themselves on each side the entrance; and then our guide leaping into the fountain, wash'd himself, and went out on the other fide; when he was out he made figns to us to do the fame, which stripping our felves we foon did, to the great amazement of the native, who, as we afterwards understood, thought we had pull'd off our outward skins, having having no manner of notion of cloaths. By that time we had done this, there came two other natives with little baskets of fruit, which they fet down, and jumping into the fountain as the other had done, they went out likewise on the other fide, making figns to us to eat and refresh our selves with the fruit they had brought; which, while we were doing, they all three went away, without coming near us, but left our guard at the entrance, who kept their posts without ever stirring away. By that time we had done our repast, and got up to look about us, we found the whole enclosure furrounded by those terrible animals, tho' not one of them ever attempted to come nearer to us; the fruit they brought us was the most delicious in the world, much more excellent both for tafte and flavour, than what we had met with in our part of the island. In the middle of this hedge that furrounded us, there was a small bower, which entering, we found above two foot thick of the most sweet fragrant flowers that could be found; and this place we concluded was to be our nightly abode.

About an hour before night we had more provisions brought us, and our former baskets remov'd; which, as soon as the bearer had set down, he plung'd into the fountain, wash'd himself, got out, and went away. It being now dusky, we heard that heavenly harmony all around us, of vocal and instrumental musick, fick, and certa but l tir'd upon we v neigh

In awak' bout night, mong broug little not frainto the certain nother portion mer.

We not or they he into the away, lame;

By

O

ch

in

ise

eat

ad

all

but

neir

ook

fur-

one

us;

ious for

with

e of

as a

DOVC

low-

con-

more

skets

d set,

being

nony.

mu-

fick,

sick, made up by the voices of men, women, and children; but such voices that are not certainly to be found any where in the world but here: And we having said our Prayers retird into our bower, and throwing our selves upon our bed of flowers, after a little discourse, we went to sleep, notwithstanding the evil neighbourhood of those creatures which surrounded us.

In the morning, by break of day, we were awak'd by the same divine musick; which about noon we heard again, as we did also at night, and so for every day while we stay'd among them. We had constantly fresh food brought us three times a day, and a sort of sittle cups, out of which we drank our water; not from the fountain, or pond, which I menion'd to be in the middle of our enclosure, but from a little brook which empty'd it self into that pond; whose waters were kept at a certain height, by emptying themselves into amother little channel on the other side, in proportion to what they receiv'd from the former.

We had observed that whoever came to us, not only never approached us, but as soon as they had set down what they brought, leap'd into the pond, wash'd themselves, and went away, and three times a day made us do the same; from which we concluded that they took took us for a fort of impure animals, which were not to be convers'd with 'till we were fufficiently purify'd by the waters of that place; and which indeed was the only superstition that we ever discover'd amongst them. One thing was remarkable, that our guard of beafts always left us as foon as it was day, and came again just before the close of the evening, excepting two, which were always found at the entrance of the enclosure.

[74]

It was two months before ever our human keepers vouchsafd to speak to us, except by figns; but after that, we had generally one of other with us, except at the time of morning prayer, and repast at noon-tide prayer and dinner, 'till evening prayer and supper call'd them away. In those intervals they did what they could to make us learn fomething of the language; but we found it so difficult, that it was almost two years before we became mafters of it. By that time we had been there two months, our linen garments being pretty much fully'd, we agreed to lay them by, and go naked, as the natives did; hoping by that means to ingratiate our selves more with aked i them, by following their manners, than by be out of ing tenacious of our own. And by this time ere br our beards were grown to a great length, as toporti well as the nails of our toes and fingers, be tem. fides the face and head, and all those parts where ith the hair generally grows. The priest's whole body

Was whic Inde mean They and i We v almof ver so of the conve fance, us, if cem'd hem; o grat ver th vash'd vere a iew, a nd w omen he leaf vere ex

hape;

ay, as

was extremely hairy, tho' mine was not fo. which gave our new masters a fresh surprize: Indeed we made but a scurvy figure, a very mean appearance, in comparison of the natives. They were tall and handsome, finely limb'd, and no hair about them but on their heads: We were both little men, our heads and faces almost cover'd with hair, and his body all over fo, that they scarce look'd upon us to be of the same species: Tho' now they began to converse a little with us, it was at some diflance, as if they fear'd some contagion from unmant is, if they approach'd nearer; however they cent by cem'd very desirous to make us understand one of them; and we employ'd all our apprehension orning to gratify them on our part; but still when-wer they left us they leap'd into the sountain, with themselves, and went away. When we at they were alone we walk'd round our enclosure, to find their individual we say that it is the say that it is the least covering about them. The women and children, all naked, and without in there he least covering about them. The women as pretty were extremely beautiful, both as to face and hape; the colour of their skins was not swarby, and hape; the colour of their skins was not swarby that hy, as might be expected, from their going se with aked in so warm a clime, tho' there was a ment by the ort of an olive tincture in them; their eyes his time tere brisk and penetrating, their limbs exactly agth, as opportion'd, without any deformity among ters, be term. We were about breast high, cover'd tes where the hedge or dwarfish trees that went able body. fance, as if they fear'd some contagion from

nich fuf ace; tion

One eafts came

, exit the

ple body

Wa

W fe

ou

or

co

fre

us

un

ed

ch

th

w

m

in

th

it vii

far

po

ga ha

the

pu

of

be

bout our enclosure; so that all they saw of us was very hairy, which was what they never faw before in their lives. We perceiv'd very plainly, that tho' they endeavour'd to conceal it, they all cast a side-long glance at us. After we had continu'd about five months, we were led back to that pool which we first saw at our coming down the hill, but no body a bout it but the three natives; who, with our Lyons, conducted us thither, and there we were oblig'd to wash our selves for two hours toge ther, and found in our swimming about that the water was brackish, and therefore must have some secret communication with the adjacent This pool, we perceiv'd afterwards, was by custom, or superstition, a place in which a the inhabitants of the island purify'd themselve twice every year.

From thence we were re-conducted to on lodging, but our masters then ventur'd to come closer to us, and every day endeavour'd, with abundance of diligence, to instruct us in the language; and when we could understand the tolerably well, they seem'd very inquisitive to know what we were? Whence we came? An how we got thither? In all which we ende vour'd to give them what satisfaction we could with that little part of their language which we understood; but being at last good master of it, we gave them an account of our count religion, and manners, and also of our voya

w of

never very nceal

, we

ft faw

ody a

h our

e were

toge-

hat the

t have

djacent was by

ich a

mselve

to ou

o com

, with

in the

id ther

itive t

e? An

ende

e coul

which

mafte

count

r voya

Af-

them understand what a ship was, and how it was possible for us to pass so many worlds of seas as should take us up near seven months in our passage, and that without seeing land once in all that time; but they seem'd amaz'd not only at so strange a passage where no tract could direct them, but that men should venture their lives in so small a machine so far from their own country. They frequently ask'd us what could be the motive to so hazardous an undertaking? And said that surely we inhabited some miserable climate, that we should chuse to sly from it thro' so many dangers.

We did all we could to make them understand that it was in pursuit of gain and riches for which we did this; but we could by no means make them comprehend what gain and riches They ask'd us whether we wanted food in our own country, and were forc'd on that account to feek it abroad? We told them it was not that, but the earnest desire of having more than what was absolutely necesfary, that made us venture fo far; fince large possessions and great abundance did not only gain the respect and veneration of those who had not the same advantage, but even an authority over them. This likewise scem'd to puzzle them, for they could not form an idea of any pleasure and satisfaction that there should be in those things; but to give them the better ter notion of it, we proceeded to give them an account of our manners and condition: That envy, malice, ambition, avarice and luft, rul'd absolutely in our parts of the world; and that he who was not in some measure a slave to any of them, was look'd upon either as contemptible, or indeed very miserable.

I find, said one of them, that you are of the number of the children of wrath, of which we have an obscure traditionary account, tho' we could scarce believe it, 'till your words now confirm the fact. Oh! wretched generation, with whom reason has so little power, and passion so much. How happy are we, who want nothing that's necessary to life, nor have any desire or wishes for what we do not want.

AFTER some of these conversations we were admitted to more liberty, and allow'd a greater freedom of going among the natives in general, at least in those parts which were not fat from our first lodgings, whither we were every night conducted and guarded with our Lyons. I call them Lyons, not that they were really so; but because their heads and manes were more like Lyons than any other creature I know of; but by their temper and condition they might rather be call'd dogs, tame and domestick animals, and were much more terrible in their aspect than in their nature: As for their food, they liv'd not upon sless, but upon the fruit and and teeth dogs were of the every by we dy. and any were one any confia ve our que ven peo mer of function of the

and

the

m

1:

st,

nd

ve

n-

he

ve

ld

m

h.

t's

ies

crc

ea-

ze-

ot

ur

erc

erc

W

ht

ni-

eir

d,

nit

ad

and herbage of the country, and therefore their teeth were not made like those of Lyons, or dogs, or any other voracious animal; they were mighty tractable and obedient to the beck of their masters, and were bred so, that they every day went their rounds about the hills; by which means we first fell into their custody. We saw several other animals, both birds, and four-footed beasts, tho none of them like any we have in our parts of the world; they were all tame, and would come to the hand.

THERE was one thing remarkable among one fort of the birds, and that was, whenever any vocal or inftrumental mufick began, they constantly joyn'd in the chorus, and that with a very agreeable voice. They were very like our parots, but much larger; and by the frequent repetition of the morning, noon, and evening songs, they had learn'd the very words, and sung them.

By a frequent conversation, I found that the people of this place had no form of government among them, but liv'd like that colony of the Sidonians, mention'd in the book of Judges; that is, without magistrates, or any rule, which might contradict the inclinations of every particular or individual. And indeed there was no occasion for magistrates, when there was no ground for contention; there being no property among them, but a perpetual and and uninterrupted course of a perfect love of one another. What the earth produc'd was a fufficient stock, plentifully to provide for their subsistence; and their cultivation of these products was fo far from being laborious to them, that it was only their exercise and diverfion. In the cool of the morning, after the first prayers were over, and their first repast, the men went all out to prune the trees, and them into fuch forms and figures as they thought fit; and which they did with those white staves, headed by a fort of hooks, as I describ'd them at my first coming down. These hooks were not made of iron, but of a certain stone, very hard and close, and wrought to an edge; so that they cut very well, and did the business as well as any of our gardiner's tools can do; the natives managing them with extraordinary dexterity, as will be plain from what I shall tell you hereafter.

[80]

WHILE the men were thus employ'd, the women were taking care of their children, to instruct them both in the principles of religion, and what other duties were necessary for their future conduct; but their duties not being many, the precepts they were to learn were but few.

Tho' I have said they had no property, yet that must be understood in the lands, or in the product; for in their women, or wives, they they inva kno man lity ty ec told is an magi tion. head them and a as ge the c fpeak chief and d ment way was 1 love, was g were case t there talk v upon conte

and c

and t

was p

they had, and that so sacred, that no one ever invaded it, so that adultery was a crime unknown among them. I observed that every man had but one wife, so that in all probability the births of males and females were pretty equal; as there was this exception to what I told you of their having no property, so there is another to what I faid of their having no magistrates, tho' this indeed is scarce an exception. The oldest men among them were the heads of their families, or little tribes, and to them there was a respect and deference paid, and all publick actions were directed by them; as general meetings, approbation of marriages, the order of all folemnities, and who should fpeak or dance in them. They also had the chief place in their publick meetings, or feafts, and deliver'd to them their thoughts and fentiments in religious matters, something after the way of our fermons; the substance of which was upon God, and exhortations to mutual love, and their duty to one another; and this was generally done after their temperate meals were over, so that they should be at perfect ease to attend to what they heard. there were none of these discourses, and the talk was promiscuous, the conversation still run upon the discoveries they had made in their contemplations, and then hearing such doubts and difficulties as the younger fort propos'd; and this held them 'till the heat of the day was pretty well over, and then the young men of as or

fe to errft

he nd sht

ite delese

cerght

and ner's vith

om

the, to

for be-

were

yet or in vives,

they

went to their task of pruning and cultivating their trees and ground, and the women to instruct their children; the virgins often accompany'd their lovers in their work, and there heard their addresses. When a young man and virgin were agreed to marry, they then propos'd it to the father and mother of both; whose consent having obtain'd, as well as the approbation of the elders of their tribe, neither of which was ever deny'd, a day was fix'd for the publick solemnization of their nuptials, at which their whole tribe were always present. The ceremony of their marriage was, as well as I can remember, in the sollowing manner.

In the morning, after the first prayers were over, the bridegroom, attended by all the young men of the tribe, with musical instruments, and their heads crown'd with chaplets of flowers, came to the bower or lodging of the virgin who was that day to be marry'd; and after he had Jung and danc'd for a little while, came forth, attended with all the young virgins and girls above twelve years of age, a dorn'd likewise with chaplets of flowers; from whence hung down, both before and behind, ropes, as it were, of flowers and odoriferous The bridegroom receiv'd her with great expressions of joy and having kis'd her lips and her eyes, march'd on with her towards the publick hall of the tribe; he follow'd by the

WCILL

the y girls. theati which beaut and je pos'd ming fcent cover or cir the ai trees. 1 banks like c On th men, which bride enter'c ders, ready a spee prayer marry which nity th liver'd fon ar

after v

one an

gain,

the young men, and she by the virgins and girls. The publick hall is a fort of an amphitheatre, above an hundred yards over; round which was planted, instead of walls, lofty and beautiful trees, whose branches spreading far, and joyning artificially in their growth, compos'd a very agreeable canopy of green, intermingled with beautiful flowers of an admirable fcent; and which sufficiently shaded, tho' not cover'd, the whole space of the amphitheatre or circle; the middle of which was open to the air all round: Close to the bodies of the trees there were three ranges of seats made of banks cover'd with herbs and flowers; which, like camomile, was the better for being fit on. On these seats set all the marry'd men and women, and the elders of the tribe; the chief of which set on seats exalted above the rest. The bride and bridegroom, with their trains, being enter'd, came up to the seat of the chief elders, where the parents, of both sides, stood ready to receive them. The bridegroom made a speech, and the whole company joyn'd in prayers to heaven for a bleffing on the new marry'd pair, then the nuptial fong began, in which every one bore a part; during the folemnity the father and mother, of each side, deliver'd to the chief elder the hands of their ion and daughter, which he joyn'd together; after which the bride and bridegroom embrac'd one another, and after some kisses separated again, and began to dance, fometimes by them-

M 2

felves,

ing inomnere

man then oth;

the neiwas

nupways

was, wing

were the instruaplets ig of ry'd; little

ge, afrom

chind, ferous

great er lips

wards

the

selves, and sometimes in company, with all the rest of both their trains: When they had fung and danc'd for some time, they all went to their repast in a long room, arch'd over entirely with the branches of the trees on each fide, fo artfully interwoven, that the cieling feem'd perfectly folid; but they went not to dinner before they had all joyn'd in the noontide prayer, and which was never omitted upon any account whatfoever. After dinner the young ones went again to dancing, and the old ones to talking on what they thought fit: These revels continu'd till evening prayer, after which the bridegroom led his bride, attended as before, to the bower of blifs, I mean to that arbour where they were to confummate and rest the whole night. The boys and girls, in the mean while, had strew'd the way, from the publick hall to this bower; and on each side, as they pass'd, stood the old women strewing on their heads odoriferous flowers: When they were enter'd, the whole company dispers'd, every one to his own home. This is the ceremony of their marriage, but what that of their funerals was I cannot tell, having not feen one during the three years time of my abode among them,

I could not observe that they made any difference of days, or distinguish'd Sunday from the rest; but upon our mentioning that we set apart one day in seven, as a day peculiar for

for call of a the pray orda men after and ftopp estee labo if ti like last : and cour of o wars with the peop the i casio roun tribe blies met every ours

Raid

mitte

for the service of God, which we therefore call the Lord's-day, they cry'd out, in a fort of a wonder, Why is not every day the day of the Lord, and dedicated to his service either in prayer, or fuch duties and exercises as he has ordain'd? But when we said we did it in commemoration of God's resting from his labour, after he had in fix days created the heavens and the earth, and all things in them; they stopp'd their ears, and cry'd out, Blasphemy; esteeming it so, in calling whatever God did, labour; and expressing it in such a manner, as if tir'd with his foregoing work he wanted rest, like man, to refresh himself. We were at last admitted to their conversation after dinner, and there, to the whole company, gave an account of the customs, laws, manners and vices of our part of the world; particularly of our wars, and the many thousands slain in battle, with the vast devastations and desolation which the ambition of princes brought upon their people, all which feem'd to strike them with the utmost horror: However, this was the occasion that we were sent from tribe to tribe round the whole island, and oblig'd to each tribe in feveral particular and general affemblies to rehearfe the fame account, and always met with the same horror and detestation in every one of our audiences. This progress of ours took up the rest of the time that we staid among them; but before we were permitted to go away, there was a general affembly

of

that not ny ay diffront t we

all

nad

ent

en-

ach

ing

to

on-

up-

the

the

fit:

at-

nean

nate

zirls,

rom

each

men

ers:

pany

This

for

culiar

of the elders of all the tribes, at which were present likewise many of the younger fort; the place in which this affembly was held was about the middle of the Island, where, in a spatious plain, there arose a magnificent building, if I may call that a building whose walls were all vegetables, for they were compos'd of feveral lofty trees fet at convenient distances, the spaces between each being fill'd up with fmaller plants, which being interwoven, each within the other, feem'd a fort of a green wall which did not rife up to the roof, but left feveral openings like windows to let in both the air and the light; the roof being form'd out of the branches of the tall trees feem'd supported by them as by so many pillars; the roof of this was much the same with that I describ'd; and here likewise was such another amphitheatre, tho' much larger, and capable of holding a far greater number of people. In the midst of this there grew another lofty tree, whose branches spread far and wide, and help'd to compleat the canopy that kept off the fun and weather from incommoding the affembly. Beneath this middle tree, there was a bank all rais'd up behind it to fuch an eminence that it overlook'd the audience, and from it were made fuch speeches as were address'd to the whole company; and here it was that we were to have our audience of leave, as I may call it; and where my good friend the Priest had like to have spoil'd all by an untimely timel them after ment on, a ledge their reaso want is, to affure the e be o retur obed fhall fome profe proce the c not t upon ing v amor an ac offer fpeak and virgir the e an ac

two e

re

t;

as)

a

d-

lls

s'd

es,

ith

ch

en

ut

in

ees pil-

ith

ich

md

of

an-

and

hat

om-

dle

t to

udi-

s as

nere

of

end

unnely timely zeal for propagating the Gospel among them; for being mounted upon this eminence, after he had given thanks for the human treatment we had met with among them, he went on, and first prais'd their happiness in their knowledge of the true God, as well as in the place of their abode, and thestrength and fineness of their reasoning; but, said he, there is still one thing wanting to render your felicity compleat; that is, to hinder its expiring with your life, for I do affure you, there are much greater bleffings in the eternal kingdom of God, which can only be obtain'd by the means of Jesus Christ. return therefore of all our obligations, and in obedience to the dictates of my conscience, I shall offer you another religion, which is yet in some measure built on that which you already profess. Here the audience would not let him proceed any farther, and one of the eldest of the company spoke thus to him. Stranger, let not thy ignorance of what we believe, put thee upon a fruitless trouble to waste our time in hearing what can never have any agreeable effect among us; therefore before you proceed, hear an account of our religion, and then if you can offer any thing better you shall have leave to speak. Upon this we were ordered to descend and fland among the audience; and a young virgin of about fifteen, was commanded to mount the eminence in our room, and thence to give an account of their religion. They did this for two ends; first, to shew how well their young MILLE ones ones were instructed; and next by way of contempt, by putting so young a creature to open the argument against us. When she was got up, bowing her felf, and putting one knee to the ground, she implor'd heaven to enable her to fpeak in fuch a manner as was agreeable to the importance of what she had to utter. O Assa, (which by interpretation fignifies Thou Being without a name) 'tis thou whom we adore, thou who hast produc'd, by thy infinite power and wisdom, all things that fill the universe; thou who art infinite and every where; thou who doft by thy providence sustain every thing that is, and which only and wholly subsists by and in thee; thou who hadst no beginning, but didst give beginning to every thing else, to thee are all out prayers and our praises due and daily paid, as our eternal benefactor and fource; and to thee be praise for evermore.

Then standing upright she thus proceeded. This great God has implanted in us certain laws, which are equally evident and beneficial, and of which reason is our teacher; a teacher who can never deceive us, since this great God has given us no other guide either to him or of our own actions. As reason leads us to the being of a God, so it tells us, that we have a perpetual dependence upon him, and receive perpetual favours from him in the life which we enjoy; and therefore, that our prayers and praises should be likewise perpetual, it farther tells us, that since fine wit nef are hap enjo may noth can for h our burth mano nefac and a and a him those bount profes tion in things, us to and de the priche beg Adam had cor religio

all the

n

ne

to

n-

ch

th-

ho

m,

in-

thy rich

hou

gin-

out

, as

thee

eded.

laws,

and

d has

of our

g of a petual

petual

njoy;

hould

, that

fince

fince this great Being has created human kind with a benificent intention, for eternal goodness could have no other; it follows, that we are oblig'd to do nothing that may injure that happiness which he delign'd his creatures should enjoy; but the furest way of avoiding whatever may disturb our tranquillity, is to love one a nother; for whilft we love one another, we can never do any thing to hurt our selves; for hurt is the effect of hate, and not of love; our religion therefore is very short, and not burthen'd with many articles, fince it only commands that we love and adore our eternal Benefactor, who is entirely and every way lovely and adorable; but as a testimony of this love and adoration, we ought publickly to pay to him our thanks and our praise, and for all those things which we daily receive from his bounty; and to give infallible proofs that this profession and publick worship has its foundation in our hearts, we must always, and in all things, act according to what love requires of us to one another, and this is the fum of our religion.

HAVING said this, she made another bow, and descended from the eminence; and then the priest was order'd to go up again, where he began to tell them the whole history of Adam and Eve, and the Fall of Man, which had corrupted the whole generation, and made all the progeny of Adam to be born in original ginal fin, which excluded them from that eters nal happiness hereafter, for which their Maker had design'd them; and that therefore it was necessary that there should be a Redeemer to restore mankind to the grace and favour of God; but that could not be done by any one man, who was merely a man; therefore one person of the Godhead took upon him human nature, and was born of a virgin, did many miracles, and at last dy'd an infamous death, to make atonement to heaven for the fins of all mankind; who were by that means made capable of entering into heaven, whose gates he open'd; where rifing again from the dead, he ascended into heaven; and therefore no one can follow him thither who are not let into this congregation by baptism, and acknowledge him, as well as the Holy Ghoft, to make up one Godhead with the Father.

The priest was proceeding to the worship of the virgin Mary, and the saints and angels; but his discourse had seem'd too shocking to the assembly to let them suffer him to go on any farther. One of the elders told him he should say no more, since their ears could not hear of the Deity's being divided into three; and that a man who he confess'd dy'd, was however the ever living God; so directing the priest to come down, he got up in his place, and turning himself all round to the people, cry'd out, O happy generation, who are separated to are full ow for try wrothe pin of their nal of lons vaft this four fore your ers.

affen when the that to w

L

er

as

to

of

ne

ne

an

ny

th,

of ade ates

ead,

no

let

ow-

ake

p of

gels;

g to o on

i he not ree;

was

the the place,

ople,

sepa-

rated

rated fo far from these children of wrath, as to have no communication with them; they are rebels to reason, and God, and by that means are the most miserable of men; always fubject to fears and mischiefs, created by their own folly; and for this reason were these two fons of wrath permitted to go round our country; that hearing their account of their own wretched state and condition, you might have the greater relish of that tranquillity and happiness which heaven has made our lot,

You have read, I doubt not, all of you, the accounts our histories give of these children of wrath, which we find now confirm'd by themselves; we may therefore bless that eternal power, who at once to secure the children of love from the infection and evil machinations of the children of wrath, funk fo many vast tracts of land to divide us from the rest of this wicked world, and separate us to felicity founded on innocence; ye fons of wrath, therefore with speed retire from among us, lest your longer flay should infect our blessed bow-

WITH that we were conducted out of the affembly, and fet directly towards the place where we enter'd this happy habitation; but the day was too far spent for us to go out that night, fince we had five and twenty miles to walk from the affembly to their utmost N 2 bounds;

bounds; we were therefore conducted again to our first lodging, where we rested that night, having our usual guard about us, which we had not had ever fince we left that place 'till we return'd thither again; we had however the conversation of two or three of our first guides and acquaintance, of whom I enquir'd what was meant by the diffinction us'd by that elder who spoke last in the assembly of the children of wrath, and the children of love. We have, reply'd one of them, a history amongst us, that begins before the creation of the world, and reaches down to our separation from the rest of mankind; but though we do not build any faith upon this account, it is yet receiv'd with a great deal of veneration for its antiquity; it being written on the very first foundation of our nation. By this account the creation of the world is attributed not immediately to God, but to certain spirits made by God of wonderful power and wisdom, much beyond our comprehension; that every one of the stars, as well as the sun, were made by these immortal spirits; that the spirit who fram'd the earth, was belov'd by God above all the rest; and therefore when he had made the birds, and the beafts, and the reptiles, he animated them with life by fire given him from the spirit who had form'd and govern'd the sun; that when he had made man with wonderful occonomy in his body, he pray'd God to 'enliven it with a rational foul; in compliance with which

which 1 who by cause, that it dures fo mediate The bo work of mention vise a ike; w hat pur irft mac ng up 1 vards t ollow t aining loft al riginal. ng drive ifters of om th rath, emain'd e call'd em fro rath, h happy npassabl umber pes def

le same

[93]

1

e

S

it I-

10

e.

aof

tive

is

rst

1C-

by

ch

by

ho

all

the ini-

m

in;

nli-

ith

ich

which prayer, God infus'd reason into man. who by that reason was likened to its divine cause, and has this difference from its body. hat it never dies, but is eternal; that is, endures for ever, fince nothing that is the immediate work of God himself can ever perish: The body indeed dies, but that was only the work of the great and wonderful spirit before mention'd. This new made man having likewife a woman joyn'd unto him, begot their ike; whose race for many years kept up to hat purity and innocence in which they were inft made, and which they preferved by keepng up to the directions of reason; but aftervards they began to neglect that duty, and blow the direction of their passions; which aining head, foon depos'd reason, and with loft all knowledge of God, and their own riginal. They left their delicious abode, beig driven out indeed by angels, or some mis ifters of the great spirit who made them, and om that time call'd them the children of rath, but yet his children; and those who main'd innocent, who were in all but four. e call'd the children of love; and to keep em from being seduced by the children of rath, he funk all the ground about this place, happy abode, and furrounded it with vaft apassable waters; here they encreased to the umber which you now find. This history bes describe the children of wrath much in e same manner as you have describ'd the people people of your countries; which will add a heard i great authority to this book, at least in that particular; but yet not enough to make us add I sha any thing to our religion, either as to ming notwith ling some other worship with our adoration of could of the one God, or those maxims which direct motion our conduct to one another. And you may which, thank our principle, which forbids us the kill rance of ling of any living creature, that you escaped going with your lives, for offering such absurd no liar and tions of three Gods; a man God, or one that dy'd as man. This, and much more, he urged When against our religion. against our religion, as propos'd by the priest that the To put off the discourse, I ask'd what the though meaning of that procession was, which I found seemed they perform'd four times a year; the whole parts of nation going round the mountains that encome ver'd pass their whole country, singing hymns of short, songs of praise to God for some great deliver spent i ance: He told us that it was in commemora tion of their being separated from the children of wrath, which they counted the greatest bles fing that heaven had bestow'd upon them. The evening coming on they left us, and we re tir'd to our bower to rest; the next morning as foon as prayers were over, they came to us again, and led us up the hill to the place where we enter'd, and where we found ou plank and rails still remaining; so parting with our children of love, we pass'd it, and came into our old territories, and by night got to Qui

our ha

one an for ev wanted family and pl their f they w close t liquid, of cer of: V

instrur

our habitation, in the manner which you have idd a heard from my wife. that s add I shall only add concerning the people, that ning-notwithstanding they were all naked, we never on of could observe the least look, word, gesture, or motion, which had any favour of immodesty; which, for all that I know, besides the temperance of the people, might proceed from their going naked; for that making all things familiar and constant to the eye, took away all curiosities, which our garments hiding, promoted when we told them that we wonder'd at least that they cover'd not those parts which we thought modesty requir'd they should; they found feemed to laugh at our folly, in thinking the whole parts of generation ought more to be cover'd than any other part of the body. ns of short, their life seem'd wholly celestial, being eliver spent in the praise of God, and the love of mora one another. They had no trades among them, for every one made what instruments they wanted themselves; and the children of each family wove, as I may call it, those little dishes and plates or trenchers, in which they ferv'd their fruit at meals; wove, I call it, because they were made of a fort of rushes, twisted so place close together, that they would even hold a liquid, and of the same material; and the shells of certain nuts they form'd their drinking cups of: What and how they made their musical instruments, I do not know, tho' I have heard a great

ildren

blef

. The

ve re

rning

ne to

d out

with

came got to

out

a great variety among them, for they were workderful proficients in the art of musical numbers; they were all likewise poets, but their poetry consisted only of hymns and love songs.

Being return'd home again to my wife, I was forry to hear of the loss of the rest of our company, but glad to find her still alive. All that I had learn'd during my absence, which could be any way beneficial to her, was the cooking, as I may call it, of the feveral fruits which grew amongst us; particularly in making of oyl, or squeezing of it out of a fruit which we had before not minded, and which was of an excellent flavour and relish, and very much heighten'd several of our dishes. But no thips yet appear'd, and very little hopes we had that we should ever escape from that solitude to our more peopled world. The priest and I every day walk'd out some where or other, yet generally we went but a little way, because we would not leave my wife alone. One day taking a turn towards those mountains, or high rocks, which run cross the country, and separate us from the children of love, we chanc'd to see, at the foot of them, a certain reddish fand, which we fancy'd to be gold; and taking it up, perfuaded our felves that it really was fo, being wash'd down from those rocks by the great showers which had been all the day before; we took two or three handfuls, and carry'd with us to my wife; who perfuaded perfu and f now which the fa that f with in the gold, right, cordin find a hauste lent r from alway the fi ty we dent togeth real v us wh theref for w tering and le or ro

down

media

speed

on-

ers;

etry

was

our

All

nich

the

uits

cing

nich

was

very

t no

had

tude

nd I

ther,

be-

One

ains,

ntry,

we

rtain

old;

at it

n all

aded

perfuaded us to fetch all we could find of it, and fill those chests and trunks which were now empty'd of all our linen and cloaths, which by this time were pretty well confum'd, the faid, fince we had little else to do: And that fince we might fome time or other meet with a conveyance from that place, if we could in the mean time get any stock of this suppos'd gold, it might be of great use to us if it prov'd right, in our return to our own country. Accordingly we went and brought all we could find at the first place; but that was soon exhausted, there being no supply except after violent rains, which we suppos'd wash'd it down from the mountains; so we were careful to go always after the rains, not only where we found the first, but all along wherever we could come near them for the woods. We had now pretty well fill'd one of our boxes, when an accident happen'd that put an end to our raking together what we did not know would be of any real value; or if it was, it could be none to us while we remain'd where we were, and therefore not worth the running of any rifque; for whilft we were one day gathering this glittering fand, we heard a most prodigious noise, and looking up we faw part of the mountain or rocks about half a mile from us tumbling down, and covering the country about it; we imhose mediately, being sufficiently frighten'd, run full speed to our own habitation, where only we andthought who thought our felves fafe, being above three miles from the mountains.

Northing else happen'd that is worth relating, during our stay in this place, which was above two years longer. At last taking our walk to the sea side, we thought we saw a ship, and found before it was dark that it was really fo, and that she was making what fail she could towards our island: We went home with this good news to comfort my wife, who had been extremely uneafy at our flay so many hours more than we us'd to do. The next morning we all walk'd again to the fea fide, and found the ship just entering our port or road; and that which was a greater fatisfaction to us, we perceiv'd that she carry'd French colours. The shore was very broad, so that the ship came very near land, and at last laid her fide close to the fhore; and feeing us they hail'd us, and made feveral figns, as if they thought we were natives of the place, and understood not their tongue; but the priest ran nearer to them, and call'd to them in French, telling them they might fafely come afhore; which was very agreeable news to them, fince they had above eighteen of their men very fick, whom they brought all on shore, in order to the recovery of their health: The ship likewife was pretty much shatter'd in a storm, which had driven them into those parts. Now my thought my fom ing tities very was gent coun of h their our f dren only the in but w our p ten fo fcore which by the the ch not. days, is heaven I had t returni all the l ing her

been ir

all reco and the bottles, it

at

nt

ıy

ur

lo.

he

our

fa-

y'd

fo

last

g us

as if

and

ran

tel-

hich

they

fick,

er to

like-

orm,

Now

my

my store of wine, which had continued by its some years, was of considerable use; for giving the fick feamen some of it in small quantities, and mingled with water, it contributed very much to their recovery. The ship's name was the Barfleur, and the captain of her was a gentleman of Bretagne; to whom we gave an account of all our adventures, and who, with some of his crew, perfuaded the prieft and me to be their guide to the place where we had made our former entry into the territories of the children of love; he refolving, if he could, not only to see the place, but to take some of the inhabitants, and carry them into France; but when we came there we found not only our plank gone, but the breach or gap, from ten foot, as we left it, widen'd to above threescore yards, and not much less in the depth; which, whether it was done by accident, or by the natives, to prevent any more visits from the children of wrath, as they call'd us, I know We staid in those parts two or three not. days, in hopes, at least, of hearing some of that heavenly musick, of which both the priest and I had told them, but to no purpose; fo that returning back to the ship, the captain made all the hafte he could in refitting her, and refreshing her with fresh water, of which they had been in great need. And the men being now all recover'd, and our baggage carry'd on board, and the wine that yet remain'd drawn off into bottles, of which the captain had a pretty good stock.

[100]

stock, tho' all empty'd in his voyage; putting likewise on board plenty of the most lasting fruit of the island, we all enter'd the Barfleur, and put out to sea.

I need not give you any relation of the feveral storms we met with, or the other common accidents which happen to sea-faring people; I shall only observe, that after many months voyage, as we came almost to the chops of the channel, we met with a Dutch man-of-war, who attempted to take us; but being a ship of pretty good force, and maintaining her felf with a great deal of bravery, bringing the Dutchman's main-mast by the board, we sheer'd off, being too weak in guns and men to pretend to take her: We made all possible fail, and foon got out of danger, and reach'd the first port we could in France, which was Bayonne; having lost a dozen men in the fight, among which was the captain, as well as many wounded, in the number was my felf, for there I loft my right hand; and the ship being very much batter'd, the prieft, my wife, and my felf, were very glad that we were once more got on shore in Europe, protesting we would never again feek our fortunes by fea; and I believe my wife, though the has a great mind to see her native country; England, will never do it, because we must pass some part of the sea to arrive there.

lions vinia a pietre good flock,

WE

W

cur'd,

we n

in the

to our

ported

to get better

dross,

d'Ors:

to thr

to hir

with

nefice

ftill w

and is a year

pany;

the tru

wife a great c

I set u

ty; bu

very n

chose

we ho

quently

[101]

nġ

iit

nd

VC-

on

le;

ths

the

ar,

hip

self

the

er'd

ore-

fail,

:h'd

was

ght,

ma-

. for

be-

vife,

vere

ting

by

as a

Ing-

pass

WE

We staid at Bayonne 'till my arm was quite cur'd, by the surgeon of the ship; and here we made tryal of our gold dust, and found in the experiment, that there was indeed a great deal of that valuable metal amongst it, to our great satisfaction; for it not only supported us while we staid there, but enabled us to get to Paris; where being furnish'd with better tools to separate the ore from the drofs, we found that we had of pure gold to the value of more than two thousand Louis d'Ors; which the priest propos'd to divide into three equal shares, of which he took one to himself, and gave us the other two; and with his share he purchas'd himself a good benefice about twenty miles from Paris. He still wears his beard, and eats no steff nor fish, and is now alive, hale and jolly, coming once a year to Paris, where I am fure of his company; and who, when he comes, will confirm the truth of all I have told you. As for my wife and I, we try'd many ways, and spent a great deal of our money to little purpose, 'till I set up a Tavern at the other end of this city; but my wife knowing that the English very much frequented this part of the town, chose this house we now live in; and where we hope, by your means, that she may frequently converse with her own countrymen.

HERE

[102]

Here my landlord made an end, with abundance of protestations of the truth of all he had told me; being ready, if I desir'd it, to confirm it with his solemn oath before a magistrate. The priest arriv'd here a sew days after, and confirm'd every part of this account, from the time of their being taken by the pirates, to their coming away in the Barsleur, prossering to give me an attestation of the whole in writing under his own hand; or, if I requir'd it, his oath: Which tho' I then resus'd, with abundance of thanks for his civility, I will yet procure it, if you request it, of him, for he is still in this city. I shall only add, that I am,

Your most sincere friend and servant,

AMBROSE EVANS.

00:00:00

AΓ

Ale

Ship hi fh

So

THE

ත්යාවලයාවලයාවලයාවලයාවලයාවලයාවලයාවලයාවලයාව n al he

to ma-

days

the tati-

for uest

on-

NS.

HE

THE

ADVENTURES

OF

Alexander Vendchurch,

AND OF HIS

Ship's Crew Rebelling against him, and setting him on shore in an Island in the South-Sea, &c.

no min ent in the

Ship

a

unab law a gettii in L to di

THE

ADVENTURES

OF

Alexander Vendchurch,

And of his

Ship's Crew Rebelling against him, and setting him on shore in an Island in the South-Sea, &c.

Was born in the city of Edinburgh in Scotland; my father was a sub-stantial tradesman of that kingdom, with whom I liv'd 'till I was about twelve years of age; when being unable to bear the ill temper of my mother-inlaw any longer, I run away from my father; and getting on board an English vessel that lay then in Leith road, I sail'd in her for London, and to discharge of my passage, I took upon me the office of a cabin boy; in which I pleas'd my mafter fo well, that at my request he got me a place in the family of a considerable merchant; though it was only to run of errands, clean the shoes, and be an affistant to the cookmaid. I had in Scotland got a pretty good fmattering in the Latin tongue, and writ a tolerable hand for my age; which, when my mafter was inform'd of, and finding me very tra-Etable and good humour'd, he put me out to school to perfect my writing, and learn such accompts as might render me useful in his bufiness; my diligence and application was so great, that I foon made a confiderable progress in both; fo that I was taken into the Comptinghouse to copy letters, and such other things as boys are generally employ'd in. My mafter had a daughter, who played upon the lute, and I having a mighty fancy always for musick, I ingratiated my felf so far with her master as to give me now and then a lesson; in which I was fuch a proficient, that I believe he would have taken me on my young mistress's recommendation, for an apprentice; but I had other things in my head, which flatter'd me with greater prospects than that way of living; however, I improved my writing so well, whenever I had the leaft leifure from my mafter's business, that my young mistress having heard my performance, gave me a lute, and paid her mafter to instruct me in the notes, that I might not play all by rote, but be able to take off a tune when when I I play'd cation, fter: For age ver ness in thing on chant alwas fer willing my mas my new was a mimate v

I was herefore ag the Safery pass'd for any unes, but I come merchaster, panish o much eturn to in me

ourager

11-

a

it;

an

ok-

od

le-

na-

ra-

to

ich

bu-

eat,

in

ng-

ster

and, I

to

h I

uld

m-

her

vith

-WC

er I

iefs,

per-

fter

not

nen

when I saw it before me; in two years time I play'd tolerably well, and by constant application, in two years more, was a perfect master: For I never lost any time, as lads of my age very often do; but when I had no busis ness in the Compting-house, I was always thruming on my lute. Having liv'd with this merchant about five years, or fomething more, he was sending a factor to Cadiz; who being willing to take me with him, I prevail'd with my master to let me go: Among others of my new master's acquaintance in Cadiz, there was a Spanish merchant, who was very inimate with him, to whom afterwards I ow'd great deal of good fortune, though at last it ad like to have prov'd my destruction.

I was always for improving my time, and herefore employ'd all the leifure I had in learnng the Spanish tongue; in which I got such a pastery in a short time, that I could almost have as'd for a native Spaniard. I would no more ng any English songs, or play any English unes, but got all the Spanish musick and songs hat I could procure; for which reason, when ne merchant I just mention'd drank with my paster, I was call'd to entertain him with a panish song on my lute; which pleas'd him much, that when my English master was to turn to London, he did all he could to dein me at Cadiz; proffering me such enpuragement, that I thought fit to accept of A 2 it:

T

W

fo

th

pa

N

of

m

an re

ed or

w

ari

of

da

w

on

Wa

ag

at

an

po

wi

tin all

no

the

pai

wh

it: And being now come into a Spanish family, I soon grew a perfect Spaniard; and finding that my master lov'd to hear the guittar, I soon learn'd to play on it, though it is but a poor instrument in comparison of a lute; however my business was to please my master, which I did to such a degree, that he lov'd me extremely; nay, as much as if I had been his own son, but he was a batchelor, and a great marriage hater.

My master having a very considerable fortune fallen to him at Panama, in the West-Indies; and thinking that he could the better fecure it by going thither, he resolve upon that voyage with the next Flota that fe out from Cadiz. The only difficulty that he had was, what to do about me; for to take m with him was dangerous, at least to me, non being permitted to go into those parts but na tive Spaniards; and yet he could not think of going without me. I told him that I was wi ling to run any hazard rather than stay behin him; that I was grown so much a Spaniar in every thing, that no body would take m to be of any other country, who did not know the contrary. This pleas'd my master wonder fully, and the better to disguise me, he made me take upon me his own name, which w Gonzalvo de Toledo, only instead of Gonza vo he call'd me Roderigo, and made me pa for a near relation of his when we came Panam

mi-

ind-

tar,

ut a

ow-

ster,

me

n his

great

rable

the

1 the

folve

at se

e had

e m

non

ut na

nk o

as wi

ehin

aniar

ke m

know

onde

mad

ch w

Fonza

ne pa

me

anam

Panama. All the difficulty that now remain'd, was how to get me on ship-board, since I was fo well known in Cadiz to be a Scotchman; this likewise we got over, by pretending to part with me, and my feeming to fet out for Madrid about a month before the departure of the Flota. My master Gonzalvo furnish'd me with money fufficient for this expedition, and gave letters of credit to some of his correspondents in Sevill, with whom I negotiated some affairs of my master's, and then went on board a vessel that went to joyn the Flota, which was fail'd a few hours before our ship arriv'd, and therefore we made all the speed we could after it, without staying at Cadiz, of which I was very glad: It was near two days before we came up with the Flota; when my master was over-joy'd to see me come on board the ship in which he was. was nothing material happen'd during this voyage, but the whole Flota arriv'd very happily at the several ports to which they were bound, and we got safe to Panama, a very fine and populous city. Gonzalvo negotiated his affairs with great fuccess, and in less than a year's time might have return'd again into Spain with all his effects; but being now very old, he had no mind to undergo fuch a voyage, merely to die in Spain: He therefore resolv'd to stay there during the rest of his life, and for my part, I esteem'd no country more than that where I was likely to be a gainer; and that was with my new unkle, as he call'd himself, who grew every day more fond of me.

Our business not being very fatiguing, I had much time upon my hands, some of which I spent in making my addresses to the Ladies, but without any pain or disquiet to my self. I ferenaded fometimes one, and fometimes another, with my lute or guittar, and such dismal ditties as that place afforded: But I was not long to enjoy this tranquillity, for being one day at church, I kneel'd next to a Lady whose shape and hand infinitely pleas'd me; I made my addresses to her with such success, that she took an opportunity to let me have a fide view of her face; which was the most transportingly beautiful that ever I beheld in my life, and quite struck me to the heart; but my comfort was, that my person had not been wholly indifferent to her, and I prevail'd with her to let me know who she was, and where fhe liv'd; she inform'd me that her father's name was Don Henriquez de Tortosa, one of the most eminent citizens of Panama; in return I let her know mine, and my unkle's name; which, with some short protestations and vows of love on my fide, concluded that conversation, the place admitting of no long conferences, tho' I went home extremely pleas'd with the success I had met with. When I began to reflect, I remember'd that Don Henriquez de Tortosa was the greatest enemy that my that Elv. to k

M abou affect my y to m on n fortu tate h long a I coul I bore addre mere . dure ? tions ! me in dreffes him fo I wou to run tries, v ticular tell hir

my pai

ing his

my unkle had in that city, and that he was equally hated by him; this made me conclude that I must manage my amour with Donna Elvira with the utmost caution and secrecy, to keep it from the knowledge of both the old Gentlemen.

My unkle had before now talk'd with me about marriage, affuring me, that if I fix'd my affections on any woman, in order to make her my wife, he would take care to give success to my choice, by making fuch a fettlement upon me as should be sufficient to answer her fortune; but I always told him I would imitate him, and continue a batchelor, at least as long as I should be happy during his life, and that I could not think of dividing that love which I bore him with any other; but as for those addresses I made, they were only amusements, mere effects of gallantry, without the least tinture of love. He gave me some prudent cautions for my conduct in those affairs, putting me in mind of the danger which those addreffes very often brought upon us; I thank'd him for his care of me, and affur'd him that I would not carry matters fo imprudently as to run any risque in the pursuit of my gallantries, which were too general to draw any particular jealousie upon me; but I never durst tell him, as long as he liv'd, one word about my passion for Elvira, being afraid of offend ing him; for a Spaniard's hatred is never to be

1 s d

be appeas'd, and therefore I very well knew that on her father's account he would never indulge, or even pardon my inclinations for the daughter: However, I took care to find means of conveying a letter to her, by bribing, with the help of a friend, the Duenna, or governess, who had the immediate guardianship of Elvira; she being the only daughter of Don Henriquez, and very much belov'd by him, was permitted more liberties than the young Spanish ladies are generally allow'd.

I shall not here pretend to give you copies of the several letters which I sent her, or of her answers, they being all lost at the same time that my wealth was ravish'd from me; it must suffice that they were really passionate on both sides, and the effect of a true and violent passion. By the help of the Duenna I had several interviews with my mistress, in which we both deplor'd our mutual misfortunes, in the hatred that was fix'd betwixt her father and my unkle; but yet we fometimes comforted our felves, that they were both very old, and very infirm, so that if either dropt, we imagin'd that the other might easily be brought to give his consent; but we were out in this, for want of considering, that when a Spaniard hates One of a family he hates them All.

last tifu nep bequinear ticul terw posses left ral chone hands the west

fire we to further to centre pose in this most conting the kle, that swore better to at ling hir her, or

My unkle, who had never well recover'd his voyage from Spain, was now taken ill of his last sickness, and took care to leave me so plentiful a fortune, that if I had been really his nephew, I could not have desir'd more. He bequeath'd a considerable legacy to one of his near relations in Spain, and lest me a particular charge to remit it to him; which asterwards prov'd a great damage to me in the possession of that fortune which Gonzalvo had lest me, and which, after all legacies and suneral charges were paid, amounted to upwards of one hundred thousand pieces of eight, a very handsome stock for a young merchant to begin the world with.

1-

e-

es

al-

pies

of

ne;

flio-

truc

enna

, in

unes,

ather

mfor-

old,

, we

ought

is, for

aniard

MY

Some time after my unkle's death, my defire was too eager to have Elvira to my wife, to suffer me to consider things calmly; I therefore, by a common friend, made motions to Don Henriquez, of an accommodation; and to cement our new friendship, made him propose me as a husband for his daughter. On this motion Don Henriquez slew out into the most extravagant passion in the world, uttering the vilest abuses, both against me and my unkle, that an inveterate malice could prompt, and swore bitterly that he would sooner give his daughter to an Alguazil (a hangman) than to me; telling him, that if I ever made any addresses to her, or came near his house with that design, he would take care that I should be treated like an invader of the honour of his family; but having no notion of that affair which I had so long had with his daughter, he did not abridge her of those little liberties which he before allow'd her; he thought it sufficient only to tell her of the proposal that had been made, with his own answer; adding, that he hop'd he had no occasion to threaten her with his curse, if she ever listen'd to any solicitations from him; which indeed he did not expect, supposing that this proposal was only an effect of the care of my own interest, and not of love.

This discourse, though it struck Elvira to the heart, yet she knew her father too well to suffer either her looks or words to give him the least suspicion of the truth. We both long'd to see one another, but how to accomplish it was a difficulty which neither of us could presently think of surmounting.

There was in Panama an old Gentlewoman named Donna Bianca, who was a widow, and a very near relation of Don Henriquez; and on that account, as well as for the love she express'd for his daughter, was always well received at his house, and Elvira was allowed by him to make frequent visits to her at her house. The engaging this widow entirely in our cause, appeared the only means of an interview between us. Bianca was not only only by ag her 1 done theref who foon mising to be ly at faction fuperfl transpo one to roung passion duc'd neither thought meeting familiar little scr were n herefor such a c y in or out mar e accor

er fathe

ble ene

ecause a

only covetous by nature, but render'd more fo by age, which open'd a way for me to make her my own; but even that was not to be done without some caution and address; I therefore made use of an acquaintance of hers, who had fome dependance upon me, and foon brought matters to bear, for by promising large rewards, she allow'd her house to be the place of our rendezvous: Accordingly at last we met there, to the infinite satisfaction of us both. It would be endless and superfluous to give an account of the joys and transports of our meeting, it is enough for any one to consider what might pass between two young people, equally possess'd with a violent passion: We met often, and every time produc'd new warmth, and new defires, which neither party had power to check, or any thoughts of doing so; on the contrary, every meeting seem'd to encrease our love, and those familiarities which hearts perfectly united make little scruple of; but whatever they were, they were not sufficient to satisfy our desires; we herefore confulted how to bring matters to uch a conclusion as might make us both hapy in one another, which nothing could do out marriage; but that we knew was not to e accomplish'd in a publick manner, and by neans her father's consent, who was my irreconcileonly cause after the consummation, and her setng with me, it must be known, and by con-B 2 fequence

a, of

to

I

t

e

ıt

n

e

th

ti-

vell im ng'd h it pre-

WO-WI-Hens for as alz was her r en-

to

ne

CO

 B_{i}

be

co

be

We E

no

he

to

pre

eve

ma

up

on the

but

pist the

noi

gre

bac

we

hor

WO

be '

fequence draw upon us both fuch a revenge, as would not end without something very fatal and dreadful; the only means that we could find out, was, that I should call in all my effects in those parts, and return to Spain, taking her with me. This therefore was refolv'd upon, and I immediately began to fet in earnest about it. If we had kept this resolution to our felves, I believe it had met with fuccess; but taking Bianca into our council, being, as we thought, necessary to our accomplishing it, she privately betray'd us; for considering that by our departure, there would not only be an ends of her profit, which was what made her our friend, but that she should be left alone to stand the fury of Don Henriquez's refentment, she resolv'd to play another part, secretly to reveal so much of our affair as might disappoint our designs, and render what she did acceptable to Elvira's father; telling him, that he had best have a watchful eve over his daughter, fince she had certain information, that she not only met me under pretence of coming to visit her, but that matters were brought to fuch a head, that our marriage was fuddenly design'd. The old Gentleman was in a prodigious fury at what he heard, 'till Bianca advis'd him not to depend entirely upon her information, but to have her watch'd whenever she went out: Don Henriquez took her advice, and accordingly provided not only spies to watch her, but Bravo's ige,

fa-

uld

my

ain,

re-

fet

eso-

with

ncil,

com-

onsi-

not

what

d be

Tenri-

other

affair

ender

ther;

chful

ertain

under matt our

Gen-

epend

ve her Hen

y pro-

ravos

to put an end to his fears by my death. The next time of our appointed meeting I happen'd to come first, and was extremely surprized to find Bianca's doors fast, and that they would not be open'd by my knocking, or any noise I could make: I began to suspect that we were betray'd, and therefore taking the two men I always had with me, for fear of accidents, I went a little forwards in the way that I knew Elvira must come; and accordingly met her not many paces from Bianca's house. I told her what had happen'd, and the cause I had to fear that our fecret love was made known to her father; she was struck with an inexpressible grief and concern at this unhappy event; but while we were confulting how to manage our affairs for the future, there came up half a dozen men, two of them feiz'd upon her and her Duenna, and hurry'd them away, the other four at the same time made at me; but retiring a little way, I drew out my pocket pistol and shot among them, which forc'd them a little to retire; but finding they were none of them hurt, they came on again with greater violence; in which interval I retreated back to my two men; we all drew our fwords, and behav'd our felves fo well, that we made them leave the place, and fo got home; but in the scuffle I receiv'd two wounds, which for some time were thought to be very dangerous, and so bad that it was given out out I should die of them; and indeed it was some time before I perfectly recover'd.

[14]

You may be fure that I made it my endeavours to enquire after the fate of my mistress, and of what treatment she had met with upon this discovery; all that I could hear was, that her father had fent her away from Panama; some said to Portobello, and some to Spain, but most were of this latter opinion; but for fear of a mistake I dispatch'd a friend in whom I could confide, to Portobello, to make a strict enquiry whether she was there or not, but could not hear the least news of her; so that I resolved to hasten the calling in of my effects, in order to go into Spain after her: But this was not to be done with any manner of convenience, without taking up a considerable time. However, having at last fettled my affairs, I freighted a ship with all my own cargo; defigning very fuddenly to set out from Panama, which I was the more expeditious to accomplish, because I had not only been frequently attack'd by the partisans of Don Henriquez, but was more terrify'd by the arrival of Lorenzo de Toledo, a near relation of my suppos'd unkle; to whom he had left the handsome legacy I before mention'd: But he, not fatisfy'd with that, was come to Panama, to examine who it was that had depriv'd him of the possession of the whole; for Roderigo de Toledo was knov read little men ferva there had fince and lifhm Scot here in p Cath who my] it. kle's and cfpor cret to g I wa to th get o cord renz his

who

he t

This

was a person of whom he had not the least When he arriv'd, I was almost ready to go on board, but his coming put a little stop to it; for when he saw me, he remember'd that I was Alexander, his relation's fervant, and not Roderigo his nephew; and therefore made his complaints, that either I had forg'd the will, or that it was invalid, fince I was mention'd there in a wrong name, and not being a native Spaniard, but an Englishman (for they make no distinction between Scotch and English) and, as he suppos'd, an heretick, I could be neither heir nor executor, in prejudice to a native Spaniard, and a true You may be fure I deny'd the Catholick. whole charge, fince not only my fortune, but my life, might in some measure depend upon Don Henriquez, tho' he hated all my unkle's family, yet having a greater aversion to me, and in hopes to embroil our affairs, he plainly espous'd the cause of Lorenzo, and I had secret information that they were endeavouring to get an order to seize both me and my ship; I was therefore advis'd to put in my appeal to the Courts of Spain, and immediately to get on board, and put off to sea; which accordingly I did, but not so soon but that Lorenzo had found means to get a creature of his on board my ship, as a common sailor, who should accomplish my destruction, which he brought about in the following manner: This creature of his was a cunning fellow, had had foon infinuated himself into the good graces of the rest of the sailors, assuring them that they would not only do God good fervice, in destroying an heretick, but secure to themselves most of the ship's cargo by throwing me over-board; which had certainly been done, had not a small storm, for a while, deferr'd the mischief they intended me. This storm had driven us very near an island in the South-Sea; which, tho' once inhabited, they knew was now quite depopulated; which however mov'd the master, who ow'd his employment to me, to move them rather to fet me on shore upon this defart island, than to throw me into the sea. Accordingly the mutiny being now ripe, they told me that as I was a heretick, they could not hope to prosper in their voyage whilft I remain'd in the ship; and though they intended to cast me over-board, yet by the master's mediation, and the appearance of that island, they chang'd their resolution, and were determin'd to set me on shore with fuch provisions and necessaries as they could spare. I did all I could to pacify them, and recover them to their duty, but to no purpose; I might as well have talk'd to the sea or the winds, for bigotry and desire of gain had made them entirely deaf to all I said; I therefore submitted to a fate I could not prevent, and was fet on shore with such provifions and utenfils as they were pleas'd to allow me, and which they would not so much as carry carry them mark choly fortu defol: would mont shot, fome buildi protec fo tha no aff long grieve condit had k out of island 1 I migh of nec of whi hammo obtain' well, I a lodgi many F a hut,

1

I

of care

was r

conveni

carry up into the island for me, but just fet them on shore a little above the high water mark, and fo went off. I stood with melancholy eyes to fee them fail away with all my fortune, and all my hopes, leaving me on a desolate island, with no more provisions than would, well manag'd, serve me about two months. They left me indeed a gun, some shot, and some powder, a little kettle, and fome few tools, which might be necessary for building me a little hut, for my residence and protection against the injuries of the weather; so that if the island it self should afford me no affiftance, my life could not be of a very long date: But I found it was in vain to grieve and repine at what I had loft, or the condition in which I was. And so when I had look'd at the ship 'till she was got clear out of fight, I went a little farther up into the island to search for a convenient place, whither I might transport, by degrees, that little stock of necessaries which the villains had left me, of which I valu'd nothing more than a poor hammock, which, with much intreaty, I had obtain'd of them; for being always us'd to lie well, I was very apprehensive of having so hard a lodging as the cold ground. I had not gone many paces before I discover'd a little fort of a hut, tho' almost dropping down, for want of care to repair it; however, such as it was, was resolv'd to enter into it, and see what convenience it afforded for my self, and what arry I had

7-

e

W

e-

a

in

nd

rd,

ar-

lu-

ore

ney

em,

our-

fea

gain

d; I

pre-

ovi-

low

a as

I had to place in it; I was likewife willing to shelter my self against the violent heat of the fun, for it was then but just turn'd of noon; and there I refolv'd to remain 'till the cool of the evening should enable me to fetch my things thither. With these thoughts I enter'd the hut, and making to the most shady part of it, which was likewise the darkest, I threw my felf down on the floor, in order, if I could, to take a little nap; but was very much furpriz'd when I heard a human voice, tho' in imperfect founds, as from a person afleep, crying out in these words, Oh! Roderigo, feveral times repeated, and attended with many fighs. I could not immediately tell what to do, but to fatisfy my felf drew nearer to the found, and found that there was some body asleep there, but who or what I could by no means fo much as guess; my motion and feeling about, at last, awak'd the sleeper; who affrighted to find some body near her (for it was a woman) started up, and was running away; but I foon stopp'd her, and taking her by the hand gently, enquir'd, Who she was? Whence the came? And what brought her thither? But what amazement where we both ftruck with when I faw that it was Elvira, and she beheld in me her unfortunate Roderigo! We both a while flood gazing at each other, when all I could utter was, Sure it is impossible that this should be my Elvira! And all she could fay was, Oh! heaven, is it possible! Can it be!

Is to Yes nor ceffing an we of fepa will fhe I hadear complove of response to the response to the Yes nor ceffing an we of the I hadear comployed to the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing and the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing and the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing and the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing and the Yes nor ceffing an investment of the Yes nor ceffing an in fhe, by the my adm me had fhou verite me veng confirmation all infaid.

ing :

to

he

n;

of

ny

r'd

art

ler,

cry

ice,

1 a-

igo,

ma-

hat

to

boby

and

who

or it

ig a-

her

was?

thi-

ruck

she

We

when

that

ould

t be!

Is

I

Is this my Roderigo! We both at once cry'd, Yes, yes, and flew into each other's arms; nor could our embraces and kiffes foon find a cessation, but our first extacy being over, we began to ask and enquire of each other, how we came thither? I gave her a full account of all that had pass'd fince the time of our separation to that day: But, concluded I, I will no longer complain of fortune, fince if the had not frown'd in this manner upon me, I had not now had the blefling of clasping my dear Elvira in my arms; nor will I, said she, complain of mine, fince it has brought my beloved Roderigo to mine; so after an interval of repeated embraces, she gave me the following account of her adventures.

When I was forc'd away from you, faid the, near Bianca's house, I was hurry'd back by the Ruffians who seiz'd me (one of whom was my brother) to my father's house, but was not admitted into his presence; for my brother told me that his indignation was so great, that he had sworn never to see me more, lest his rage should transport him to use me with such severity, as he might afterwards repent. He let me know that Bianca had betray'd me, in revenge of which I told him that she had been my consident in the whole affair; and for the sake of money had given us the use of her house, with all imaginable freedom; which my brother said he would take care to let my father know as foon as his passion was a little more abated; in the mean time he advis'd me to write a fubmissive letter, which perhaps might make way for a reconciliation, tho' he fear'd not. writ not only one, but feveral letters to my father, in hopes to revive his former tenderness to me, that I might by that means gain a little more liberty, in order to find out some way of letting you know the posture of my present affairs; but my Duenna being turn'd out of doors, and I put under the severest confinement, could not possibly accomplish it. My brother at last brought me word, that I must immediately prepare for a voyage to Spain: This news flruck me to the heart, especially fince I had no means of letting you know it; but it was in vain to struggle, my father was inexorable, nor would he fo much as admit me into his presence, even so much as to take my leave of him; but fent me on board fo guarded, that it was impossible for me to give you the least notice of my condition. In short, we set fail in an evil hour; for we had not been out many days before we were attack'd by a French privateer, and were taken by her: But not much caring for the ship, they were contented with its plunder, fcarce leaving us the cloaths. we had on our backs. This misfortune was foon after attended with another; for when, upon a confultation, it was refolv'd to turn back again to Panama, as having neither provision nor cargo left to proceed on our intended ded they just 1 it dr days in da had fhatte despa ly co we h you : fatisf: yet co rocks to be withi that t found would had b and to felf, to my meteen covery negreat

C 2

gers,

funk.

1- pecting

ded voyage, they thought it the best course they could take; but, as I was faying, a fform just then arose, which prov'd so violent, that it drove us farther from the coast for several days together, infomuch that our lives were in danger; because the ship, by the fight she had sustain'd with the French, was very much shatter'd, and grown so leaky, that they almost despair'd of keeping her above water. The only comfort we had in all this diffress was, that we had discover'd land, being the island where you now find me; but that which lessen'd this fatisfaction was, for fear that the storm which yet continu'd, should dash us to pieces on some rocks, which they either knew, or concluded to be about this coast: However, being now within a league of the shore, they were in hopes that they might reach it in their boat if the ship founder'd, as they expected every minute it would, and which foon after it did. had but just time to get me, three other passengers, and themselves into the boat, but the ship. funk.

y

:

y

1;

as

17

d,

he

Cet

12-

ch

ted

ths.

vas

en,

ırn

ro-

cd

The number of us in the boat was about two and twenty persons, that is, the master, my self, three other passengers, one of which was my maid, and, as near as I can remember, sixteen or seventeen seamen, of whom many were very much wounded in the sight. Thus with a great deal of difficulty, and every moment expecting to be sunk by the waves which perpetually tually broke in upon us, we got within a quarter of a mile of the shore, when the boat was dash'd to pieces against a rock, and we all set on float in the water, so that every one took care of themselves; and I must certainly have perish'd had not one Diego, an old servant of my father's, and who was an excellent swimmer, caught hold of me, and bidding me hold my breath as much as I could, bore me fo near the land that he could wade but up to the middle in water; where finding me quite spent, he carried me on shore in his arms; and then making me cast up all the water I had fwallow'd, he in a little time brought me to my felf. Another did the same by my maid, but I know not how it was, when she was brought on shore, either by the fright she was in, or by the great quantity of falt water she had swallow'd, she was so far suffocated that she never came to her felf. There were about half a dozen more of the seamen that got to land, the rest who were so much wounded as I have faid, were render'd incapable, as we suppose, of struggling with the waves; for they and the two Gentlemen passengers were all drown'd; and indeed our condition was very little better, for being cast upon an island where we expected no subsistence, and were entirely destitute of all support, we could not expect to live many days. The men having first stripp'd my maid, threw her into the sea; they had no instruments to dig a grave for her he dr and fio1 me Th ry pre two wit they use they Die how rem conv was had in; three did : they was ter t shou out t

woul

her on the shore; they after, hung her cloaths a drying, and her linen prov'd very useful to me afterwards.

1-

d

0

to

te

S;

I

ne

my

she

fhe

she

fhe

out

to

d as

we

they

all

very

land

were

could

have for

WE all foon remov'd farther up into the island, and the men went out to fee what provisions they could get for our relief, leaving with me Diego, that I might not be wholly alone. They found at last a small cottage, though very ruinous, in which there were two rooms pretty entire; and fearthing on, they found two or three acres of ground, some planted with turnips, and others with potatoes, and they all having knives in their pockets, made use of them to dig up these Roots; which they plac'd in the cottage, and came to fetch Diego and me to their new habitation. But how to prepare this food for our eating, still remain'd a difficulty with us, fince we had no convenience of dreffing them, though there was a chimney in this cottage; but then we had neither firing, nor a pot to boil them in; but fearching about the house they found three or four pieces of flint, wherewith they did not doubt but with the help of their knives they might be able to strike fire: Yet there was still wanting some very combustible matter to receive those sparks of fire which they should strike from their flints, so they went out to see if the place afforded any thing which would supply that defect. They found at last a dry rotten tree, some parts of which receiv'd the fire they ftruck as well as any tinder; they then gather'd together all the fuel they could find, confisting of part of this rotten tree, and other things of the like nature, with which they made a good fire, and try'd to roaft, fince they could not boil their roots; which, confidering our present circumstance, we all being pretty hungry, prov'd tolerable food. The next care they had, was how to provide a lodging for me, but they could find no other way than cleaning the floor as well as they could, and laying my maid's cloaths under me, with a small log of wood for my pillow; which, after my fatigue, prov'd so good a bed, that I slept very foundly all the night. I forgot to tell you that just without the cottage there was a fine spring of water, which serv'd us for drink; tho' our hands were all the cups we had, 'till we had found a fort of fruit very like a lemon, but its juice was fo four, that we could make very little use of it, but scooping them clean, they made us tolerable drinking cups.

This island is about seven leagues long, and three broad, and abounds with several inoffensive animals, left there by the inhabitants, who had lately quitted it, particularly goats; which we were at present but very little the better for, and in no way of taking or killing them. There were likewise some hogs, but all all t and ever coup a ki boar ther on fide had very both brea ply'c whe a bo and ner, care they fow brou > ons and the was fcou

> > min

and

all these were at the farther part of the island, and out of our power to make food of: However, one day three of our men brought in a couple of young kids, one of them they made a kind of pen for, out of the old pieces of boards they found about the place, and the other they kill'd, flead and dress'd, by broiling on the coals: And this was noble food, confidering how we had liv'd for some days. We had no napkins or plates, but a piece of board very well scrap'd and wash'd, which serv'd us both for table and trenchers. We had no bread to our dinners, but that was tolerably supply'd by our roasted potatoes; of the kid's skin, when it was dry'd in the fun, they made me a bolfter, something softer than what I had, and with other skins, prepar'd in the same manner, they improv'd my bed; for they all took care to make my misfortune as easy to me as they could. They one day happen'd to find a fow with a litter of young pigs, of which they brought away two, with a great deal of joy, and dress'd them as well as they could.

ct

n

d

Ill

ıy

e-

ou

ne

k;

ill

le-

ıld

m

nd

of-

ts,

ts;

the

ing

but

all

And indeed as long as I had my companions I bore up as well as cou'd be expected, and in three months time had us'd my felf to the hardships of my fortune so well, that I was grown a perfect campaigner. We had our scouts out every day, to see if we could discover any ships, but to no purpose; for to this minute I never heard of any 'till, your presence inform'd inform'd me that there has been one upon this coast.

Our men willing to gratify me with some variety of food, went frequently upon the strand, in hopes to find some shell-fish, and at last they brought home half a dozen oysters; which I eat with so much fatisfaction, that they ventur'd to get to a rock, when the tide was out, on which they imagin'd they faw a pretty great store of them; but this was a fatal expedition, there coming out of the fea half a dozent sea lyons, as Diego call'd them; creatures of a vast bigness, and terrible to behold, at least they seem'd so to Diego in his fright; who being nearest the shore, fled away with the loss of a piece of the sleeve of his wastecoat, and two great scratches in his arm made by the paw of the lyon, whilst all the others were devour'd by them. Diego came to me in a very great fright, and his arm all running with blood: I took him to the spring and wash'd his wounds, binding them up as well as I could; with the only handkerchief I had left. I was extremely concern'd for the loss of his companions, and the more, because it was partly upon my account that they run into this danger. Diego and I did as well as we could, I being oblig'd both to strike fire, and cook my victuals; that is, roaft my potatoes and turnips, which was all the food we had left, keeping no flesh by us, because of the heat

hear nips the

ry d the i renti a gr mort Dieg dy, to d house that : ing to ately you r all m nips a journi till t from is som Ibrou feamer wood

My being the cu

emon

is

ne d, ey

I

en-

vas

et-ital

fa

ea-

old,

ht;

vith

his

arm

the

ame

all

ring

p as

ief I

the

cause

run

ell as

fire,

pota-

of the heat

heat of the season; but for potatoes and turnips they had brought a pretty large stock into the house.

I wash'd and dress'd poor Diego's wound every day, but whether there was any venom in the creature that gave the wound, or that the renting of the flesh caus'd it, I know not, yet a great inflammation enfu'd, and after it a mortification; which foon carry'd off poor Diego, and left me all alone, with a dead body, which I had no capacity of burying. What to do I could not tell, fince to ftay in the house with him was impossible, the stench that would arise from his corrupting body being too great to be borne; I therefore immediately resolv'd to remove to this little hut where you now find me. Accordingly I first carry'd all my bedding, and then as many of my turnips and potatoes as I could, in four or five journies; which I continu'd for a day or two, 'till the stench of Diego's body deterr'd me from going any more to the cottage, which is fomething more than half a mile from hence. I brought away with me likewise two of the seamen's knives, the flints, and what touchwood we had by us, with two or three of the cups that we had made of the rhine of the emon.

My state was now indeed very deplorable, being in an island all alone, a poor helpless D 2 woman,

it

fo

ch

re

th

th

W

gr

ha

m

br

ni

th

an

an of

ho

Sp.

no

an

ag

to

fc

ca

im

tro

pe

de

bo

woman, who could not expect to support her self long with that small quantity of provisions which my old companions had left me, not knowing how to come at more when they were spent, without the utmost difficulty. Thus I have liv'd upwards of a week, but now heaven has sent you to my relief, which may yet a while delay my fate, tho' I am not at all solicitous to put off that death which in a little time seems to me inevitable: However, I shall die with pleasure, since it is given me to expire in the arms of my Roderigo.

HERE she made an end, and after a thoufand tender embraces, I bid her be comforted, and cherish better hopes, since I was now with her to take care of her, and provide fuch necessaries as the island afforded. The evening growing cool, I went to the shore where I was landed, and by degrees brought all my provisions and stores to the little hut; where having first refresh'd Elvira with what I had to eat, and a little wine, for the rogues had been fo bountiful as to give me a gallon and no more, having finish'd our repast, with much ado I fix'd up my hammock, in order to mend the lodging of Elvira. She made some scruples at first of permitting me to lie in the same place with her; but having convinc'd her that we were really man and wife before heaven, having pronounc'd all the obligatory tyes of matrimony, which were the only effentials of it, she seem'd less averse. I told her that as for the prieft, and the other formalities of the church, they were mere ceremonies, and wholly political; that the children of Adam were really marry'd, tho' they had no priest to join them, for there was no priest then in the world; that ours was the same case, being in an island where there was no body but our felves. It growing now dusky, we both went into the hammock, and flept very heartily; the next morning we got up, and having taken our breakfast, I resolv'd to go and bury the dead body, that we might remove to more convenient quarters. There grew by the hut some fine scented herbs, and taking such tools as I thought might do the office of a spade, I went and dug a hole large enough for the body; and with a great deal of trouble, in the midst of a horrid stench, I got the corpse into the hole; I foon cover'd it up, and went to the spring, wash'd my hands and face, mouth and nostrils, to get away all the relicks of the stench, and then I drank a little of the water, and return'd again to Elvira; though before I came back to her I rubb'd my felf all over with the fweet scented herbs I mention'd before, that I might carry her no disagreeable smell. She receiv'd ime with joy and open arms, and told me how troubled she was at the nauseous office I had perform'd. I reply'd, that the burying of the dead was a christian duty, and here being no body to do this but my felf, I thought I was oblig'd

ner visine, hey hus neayet all

n a er, I

e to

houfortnow

fuch ming I was provi-

havad to been

d no h ado nd the

ruples fame r that

eaven, yes of

ials of

it

oblig'd not to neglect it; that besides the discharge of that duty, I had provided her The day growa more convenient habitation. ing hot, we retir'd again to our hammock, where we repos'd till two or three a clock, when we got up and went to dinner, and in the evening took a walk out into the coun-We let it be three or four days, nay, if I mistake not, a week, before we remov'd our quarters; and I had made fires and purify'd the house, and strew'd it with sweet herbs and flowers, and fitted up the coolest part for my hammock, which I brought with me. When I led my love to her new dwelling, that being fix'd, I began to remove my effects, which took me up above two days, working only carly in the morning, and in the cool of the evening.

When all was remov'd, and we entirely fettled, I began to think that I was not so unhappy as the losses I had met with would persuade me: 'Tis true, I was depriv'd of a plentiful fortune, but that was attended with many cares, and threaten'd with great disturbances, and wonderful anxieties perpetually tortur'd my mind, on account of my dear Elvira, whom I loved with the most violent of passion; on the other side, I began to set my gains against my losses, and found my self in the possession of that dear woman, without whom I could not hope for any happines; that I had hac ren lov of froi for con mad by fhe ver ther and of l nece ter e my wen gun her appr the 9000 ly ir dead noise that

fpeed

agair

full .

a val

could

had her without rival, without any awe of parents, entirely to my felf, and full of equal love; that as I wanted the pomp and equipage of the world, so I was on the other side free from all its disquiets. Company I wanted none, for Elvira was as much as I desir'd. confiderations, and many more of this kind, made me not only believe that I was happy by my present lot, but persuaded Elvira that The was so too; and indeed she never discover'd the least sentiments that she thought otherwise. We enjoy'd each other all the day and all the night too, we were never weary of being together, but always uneasy when necessity at any time parted us but for a quarter of an hour: Thus I never went out when my walk was not beyond her strength, but she went with me. I feldom went without my gun upon my shoulder, and going one day with her by the sea shore we were surpris'd at the approach of three lyons, who coming out of the sea made directly at us. I being a pretty good marks-man, shot the first of them directly into the eye, upon which he fell down dead; and either the flash of the fire, or the noise of the gun so frighten'd the other two, that they turn'd about, and made all their speed back into the sea. I charg'd my piece again immediately, however we both took a full view of the dead monster, which was of a vast magnitude; but knowing of no use it could be to me, Elvira and I retreated and left him

n

1-

7,

d

i-

OS

or

n

ıg

ch

ly

ne

ly

n-

cr-

en-

12-

an-

r'd

ra,

ffi-

ins

he

m

I

him upon the fand; whence the next tide, as I suppose, carry'd him quite away; for when I went that way again, I faw nothing of him. Finding that poor stock of provision which was fet on shore with me began to decrease, I took care to provide for the future; and not only fow'd again the turnip-feed that I had gather'd, but also some Indian wheat and rice, hoping that in time they might yield a convenient crop for our future occasions: I likewise look'd out for kids and pigs, and got enough of them both for present food, and to feed and bring up I having a pot, and two or three napkins, a cup or two, and fome earthen plates, Elvira had her dinners better dress'd and serv'd up than before I came.

In this manner we spent our life, abounding in nothing but love; nor had we any accidents or adventures during the three years she liv'd with me: But my joys were too compleat, for the malice of my fortune, to allow me a long continuance of 'em; and therefore towards the latter end of the third year Elvira was taken dangerously ill, and the distemper was so violent, that it carry'd her off in three days time.

Nothing ever went so near my heart as this loss, and had I not been preserved for more evils, the grief that Elvira's death gave me, would certainly have put an end to my life; I could

I co day as i my fine day I to as I tho let I up whill lanch ven

Wort

the be ab what I findiners, as lam upon

in, and

I could not leave the dear body for near two days after her decease, but press'd and kiss'd it as if the was yet alive; but coming a little to my self, I consider'd that she must be buried, fince it was impossible to keep her another day in this hot climate without putrefaction; I took pains, therefore, to dig a grave as deep as I could; into which, having first kiss'd her, tho' she began to smell pretty strong, I gently let her down in her cloaths, and cover'd her up with the earth, my eyes flowing all the while with tears. After this I led a very melancholy life for two years, five months and feven days, without any manner of occurrence worth the inferting.

On the last of those days, standing upon the beach with my gun on my shoulder, I discover'd a fail about three leagues to the South, but directed its course Northward; I fir'd my piece (having made very little use of my powder) which they took for a fignal of distress; but I discharg'd it once more, and then I perceiv'd they stood in to the land; and in less than two hour's time, came so near as to be able to call to me. They ask'd who, and what I was, in a fort of broken Spanish? And I finding, by some of the oaths of the mariners, that they were English, answer'd them as lamely; telling them that I was all alone upon the island, and desir'd them to take me me, in, and I would give them an account of my more life: could

art as k

ly

d,

ıg

or

or

th

up

ap-

tes, v'd

ind-

ac-

the

leat, ne a

vards

was

was

days

flory. They prefently mann'd out their boat, which came on shore and took me on board, without ever going back to my quarters, where I had left nothing worth preferving. It happen'd to be a Jamaica Sloop, William Thomas, master, which had been carrying on that private trade with the Spanish Indians, which the men of Jamaica had found very beneficial; though oftentimes very hazardous, because it was practis'd against the Spanish laws, but private gain feldom has much regard to publick tyes. We had a prosperous voyage to Jamaica, where the account of my story procur'd me such a Benefaction as was fit to fet me out, and bear my charges into England, whence I have been absent now many years. I found means of getting from London to Edinburgh, where my father was yet alive, tho' very old and crazy, my ill natur'd mother-in-law having been dead for some time. My father was very glad to receive me, and at his death, which happen'd foon after, left me an equal portion with the rest of his children: And here I shall conclude my narration, what has fince happen'd to me affording nothing material, or any way useful for a general entertainment,

FINIS.

